The questions in this note, like those in the note to Rice v. Wood, 31 L. R. A. 609, are founded upon the provisions of the act of 13 Eliz. chap. 5, and the statutes of the different states modeled after it. This act declares all conveyances or other disposition of property, real or personal, made with the intention of defrauding creditors, to be null and void as against them, with the proviso that nothing therein contained shall extend to defeat any estate or interest made on good consideration and bona fide to any person having at the time no notice of such fraud. This statute is still in force in England, and has been re-enacted in Ireland, and has been adopted by a number of the American states, including Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Iowa, and the statutes of the other states are modeled after it and are in the main simply a re-enactment of it.

Under these statutes the rule is practically universal that in order to render a sale void as to creditors it is not only necessary that the vendor should have entertained a fraudulent design, but it is also necessary that the vendee should have participated in it. Schroeder v. Walsh, 120 Ill. 403 (1887); Ewing v. Runkle, 20 Ill. 448 (1858); Anderson v. Warner, 5 Ill. App. 416 (1879); Frakes v. Brown, 2 Blackf. 295 (1830); Drummond v. Couse, 39 Iowa, 442 (1874); Preston v. Turner, 36 Iowa, 671 (1873); Fifield v. Gaston, 12 Iowa, 218 (1861); Myers v. Tyson (Kan.) 43 Pac. 91 (1896); Baudin v. Rohlff, 1 Mart. N. S. 165, 14 Am. Dec. 181 (1823); Marden v. Babcock, 2 Met. 99 (1840); Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 89, 22 Am. Dec. 400 (1831); Fraser v. Passage, 63 Mich. 551 (1886); Durfee v. Paritt, 14 Minn. 424 (1869); Ryan v. Young, 79 Mo. 30 (1883); Ames v. Gilmore, 59 Mo. 537 (1875); Henderson v. Henderson, 55 Mo. 534 (1874); Curtis v. Vuliton, 3 Mont. 153 (1878); Jaeger v. Kelley, 52 N. Y. 274 (1873); Newman v. Cordell, 43 Barb. 448 (1864); Peck v. Carmichael, 9 Yerg. 327 (1836); Woody v. Dean, 24 S. C. 499 (1885); Sterling v. Ripley, 3 Pinney, 155 (1851); Magniac v. Thompson, 1 Baldw. C. C. 344 (1831); Leach v. Francis, 41 Vt. 670 (1869).

The vendee must have been either an active or passive participant in the fraud. New York F. Ins. Co. v. Tooker, 35 N. J. Eq. 408 (1882).

The validity of a transfer is not affected by the fraudulent intent of the vendor in making it, where the consideration was adequate, unless the purchaser participated in the intent. Pickett v. Pipkin, 64 Ala. 520 (1879); Bradley v. Ragsdale, Id. 559 (1879); Stover v. Herrington, 7 Ala. 142, 41 Am. Dec. 86 (1844); Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 104; Erd v. Cole, 31 Ark. 554 (1876); Grunsky v. Parlin (Cal.) 42 Pac. 575 (1895); Partelo v. Harris, 26 Conn. 480 (1857); Hatch v. Jordon, 74 Ill. 414 (1874); Myers v. Kinzie, 26 Ill. 36 (1861); Steele v. Ward, 25 Iowa, 535 (1868); transfer, to show that the transferee had actual notice of, or was a participant in, the fraud of the maker of the transfer. The former holding of this court on this question in the case of Chandler v. Colcord, 1 Okla. 260, is overruled.

Davis, 67 N. C. 185 (1872); Lassiter v. Davis, 64 N. C. 498 (1870); State, Patrick, v. Keeler, 49 Mo. 548 (1872); Collins v. Cook, 40 Tex. 238 (1874); Connell v. Miller, 1 Kerr, N. B. 302; Gridley v. Bingham, 51 Ill. 153 (1869).

And unless such participation is made to appear. Shealy v. Edwards, 75 Ala. 411 (1883); Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zeigler, 58 Ala. 221 (1877); Old Nat. Bank v. Findley, 131 Ind. 225 (1892); Stewart v. English, 6 Ind. 176 (1855); Bastian v. Christesen, 34 La. Ann. 883 (1882); Edwards v. Reid, 39 Neb. 645 (1894); New York F. Ins. Co. v. Tooker, 35 N. J. Eq. 408 (1882); Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northrup, 22 N. J. Eq. 58 (1871).

And deeds will not be set aside as fraudulent and made with intent to defraud creditors where it appears that they were taken by the respective grantees in good faith and upon a good, lawful, and sufficient consideration. Sumner v. Skinner, 80 Hun, 201 (1894).

So, an intent of a vendor to defraud creditors will not invalidate the conveyance unless the vendee participated in it. Tompkins v. Nichols, 53 Ala. 197 (1875); Mathews v. Reinhardt, 149 Ill. 635 (1894); Miller v. Kirby, 74 Ill. 242 (1874); Hessing v. McCloskey, 37 Ill. 341 (1865); Adams v. Foley, 4 Iowa, 44 (1856); Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522 (1875); Spring Lake Iron Co. v. Waters, 50 Mich. 13 (1883); Sibly v. Hood, 3 Mo. 290 (1834); Pierson v. Tom, 1 Tex. 577 (1848); Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1847); Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717 (1881).

And the right of persons becoming interested in the property of a debtor through a conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors without participating in the fraudulent design of the debtor are not affected thereby. Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176 (1884); Blodgett v. Chaplin, 48 Me. 322 (1861); Gentry v. Robinson, 55 Mo. 260 (1874); Hall v. Arnold, 15 Barb. 599 (1853); Cannon v. Young, 89 N. C. 264 (1883); Tuteur v. Chase, 66 Miss. 476, 4 L. R. A. 832 (1889).

And the sale must have been the means of carrying the intent into effect. Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1847).

To render a transfer of property void as against creditors for fraud, the fraud must affect the contract, and the contract is not the purpose of one but the agreement of two minds. Rose v. Coble, Phill. L. 517 (1868).

The statute as to fraudulent conveyances contemplates two parties to the collusion and fraud, the grantor and the grantee. Anderson v. Roberts, 18 Johns. 515, 9 Am. Dec. 235 (1820); Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717 (1881).

The fraud which will vitiate a sale must be mutual,—that is, it must be intended by both parties thereto, or else by one and acquiesced and furthered by the other with knowledge of the former's fraudulent purpose. Horbach v. Hill, 112 U. S. 144, 28 L. ed. 670 (1884).

It is the intent that makes a conveyance of property fraudulent as to creditors, and such intent must have been participated in by the grantee as well as the grantor. Splawn v. Martin, 17 Ark. 146 (1856).

And the true question with reference to a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent is, Did the vendee make the sale with intent to defraud the creditors of the vendor, and as a means of aiding in the accomplishment of his purpose? Brown v. Foree, supra.

Thus, proof of a fraudulent intent on the part of a grantee is essential to a recovery in an action to set aside a conveyance as in fraud of creditors where the conveyance was not voluntary. Baldwin v. Short, 125 N. Y. 553 (1891).

And a conveyance is not avoided by the mere fact that it may have the effect of hindering or delaying creditors of the grantor; it must also have been made with a design to hinder or delay such creditors which must be effectuated by making the conveyance, and the intent must have been participated in by the purchaser. Hardwick v. Cox, 50 Mo. App. 509 (1892).

Nor can a creditor of a vendor maintain an action to restrain a sale upon the ground that it was in fraud of the vendor's creditors unless he shows that the vendee was a party to the fraud. Montgomery v. Wilson, 31 La. Ann. 196 (1879).

And a conveyance of property received from a fraudulent grantor without guilty knowledge or actual fraud and upon such terms as did not divert it from the payment of his debts or inflict substantial injury upon creditors, will not be set aside, even as constructively fraudulent. Smith v. Selz, 114 Ind. 229 (1887).

And an assignment of mortgages with intent to delay and defeat the collection of a particular debt will not be set aside as to the creditor to whom that debt is due unless the assignee participated in such fraudulent intent or had notice of facts and circumstances from which the fraudulent intent of the assignor was a natural and legal inference. Tantum v. Green, 21 N. J. Eq. 364 (1869).

And a statement by one of two partners that he intended to pay such debts as he could, and to "break full handed," does not show fraud in a subsequent transfer of the firm, in the absence of proof of participation by the purchaser,—especially where he refused to have anything to do with the matter unless the sale was bona fide. Waterman v. Donalson, 43 Ill. 29 (1867).

Nor can real estate purchased by a grantee in good faith before the issue of an attachment be taken thereunder upon the ground that the conveyance was made by the grantor with intent to defraud creditors. Johnston v. Field, 62 Ind. 377 (1878).

So, a sale of a chattel by a sheriff conveys good title to the purchaser, unless there was fraud in which he participated, although the property was not present at the time of the sale. Kean v. Newell, 1 Mo. 754, 14 Am. Dec. 321 (1827).

And a sale by judgment debtors, with the consent of their judgment creditors, of property which had been levied upon under execution issued on judgments confessed by such debtors, will not be declared fraudulent and void as to other creditors in the absence of anything to impeach the judgments or the good faith of the purchaser who took the property. McEvony v. McCann, 31 Neb. 597 (1891).

purchased the property that his brother was owing very large sums to various creditors for the goods was sufficient to put him upon his inquiry, and that G. W. Sherman's knowledge of such indebtedness was sufficient to charge him with knowledge of everything done or intended to be done by his brother, and therefore charged him with knowledge of the probable results of his brother's conduct, as affecting his creditors.

Work v. Coverdale, 47 Kan. 307; Dows v. Kidder, 84 N. Y. 121.

G. W. Sherman did have such knowledge; and it charged him with knowledge of the fraudulent intent of J. R. Sherman.

Stearns v. Gage, 79 N. Y. 102; Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89; Lyons v. Hamilton, 72 Iowa, 759; Dorrington v. Minnick, 15 Neb. 397; Bollman v. Lucas, 22 Neb. 796; Gollober v. Martin, 33 Kan. 352.

So, a wife to whom a deed is made by a third person by the permission of her husband, who participated with the grantor in the fraudulent intent to defraud other creditors, is not chargeable with complicity in her husband's intent, where she purchased without any participation in or actual knowledge thereof, and the evidence does not show that he was her agent. Bruen v. Dunn, 87 Iowa, 483 (1893).

And a conveyance by a husband to his wife, made for the purpose of placing the property conveyed beyond the reach of his creditors, is valid and effectual as against such creditors when made upon consideration of his receipt of her separate property through the course of many years and its appropriation to his own use, where she had no knowledge of and did not participate in his fraudulent purpose. Brookville Nat. Bank v. Kimble, 76 Ind. 195 (1881).

An instruction that if a sale was made to defraud creditors of the vendor it would be void will be taken as including the vendee with the vendor as entertaining such intent, and therefore as not erroneous, though it would have been better to have added that the knowledge of the participation of the vendee was also necessary. Miller v. Bryan, 3 Iowa, 58 (1856).

A conveyance made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, in which purpose both vendor and purchaser participated, however, is void as against such creditors, within the statute of frauds. Chapel v. Clapp, 29 Iowa, 191 (1870); Stone v. Spencer, 77 Mo. 356 (1883); Union Nat. Bank v. Warner, 12 Hun, 306 (1877); Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887); Brown v. Webb, 20 Ohio, 389 (1881); Merchants' Bank v. Clarke, 18 Grant, Ch. (N. C.) 594 (1871); Wood v. Irwin, 6 Grant, Ch. (N. C.) 398 (1869); Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446, 5 Am. Dec. 348 (1811); Beidler v. Crane, 135 Ill. 92 (1890); Millington v. Hill, 47 Ark. 301 (1886).

Although it was made with the bona fide intent to pass the property. Merchants' Bank v. Clarke, supra.

And whether the sale was or was not intended to take effect as between the parties to it. Wood v. Irwin, supra.

And without reference to the time of delivery of possession. Stone v. Spencer, supra.

And though a full and sufficient consideration is paid. See infra, III., Effect of payment of full consideration.

Thus, a conveyance accepted by a grantee with a like fraudulent intent with his grantors, and with full knowledge of which they conspired to deprive a creditor of his just claim, is fraudulent and void as against such creditors whether it was with or without consideration. Slagle v. Hoover, 137 Ind. 314 (1894).

And a sale made with the intention of preventing creditors from collecting their demands, or to avoid the recovery of judgments against the vendor, is voidable as to creditors, where the vendee participated in the fraudulent intent or had notice of it, though he paid an adequate consideration. Wright v. Brandis, 1 Ind. 336 (1849).

And a deed made with intent upon the part of the grantor to defraud his creditors, which was known to and participated in by the grantee, is void, though the grantor reserved sufficient property to pay all his debts existing at the time of the execution of the deed, and though the purchase money was duly paid by the grantee. Hudson v. Jordan, 108 N. C. 10 (1891).

So, one who purchases a stock of goods from one member of a firm to aid him in defrauding the other members and the creditors of the firm acquires no title to the goods, and a subsequent sale made by the other partners in behalf of the firm passes good title to the purchaser whether he had notice of the former sale or not. Gradle v. Kern, 109 Ill. 557 (1884).

Nor can a purchaser who obtains a stock of goods of a debtor who is making the sale with intent to delay and defraud his creditors, and is a party to the fraud or has knowledge of facts which would excite the suspicion of a prudent man and put him upon inquiry, be said to act in good faith. Martin v. Marshall, 54 Kan. 147 (1894).

And a transfer the object of which was to conceal the goods transferred from attachment, of which the transferee was fully aware having participated in it and himself suggested the arrangement, is invalid as against creditors. Hawes v. Mooney, 39 Conn. 37 (1872).

And a deed executed by a son to his father in anticipation of the son's approaching marriage, for the purpose of defeating the wife's right of dower, which is concealed from the intended wife with the collusion of the father, is void as in fraud of the marital rights of the wife, based upon the valuable consideration of marriage. Brooks v. McMeekin, 37 S. C. 285 (1892).

So, where a purchaser at a sheriff's sale, by fraudulent combination with the judgment debtor and others, is enabled to purchase the property of the judgment debtor, the whole sale is fraudulent and void as to creditors of the judgment debtor, even though the purchaser had paid his own money at the sale, and he has no right to retain the property purchased as a security for the money he has paid. Stovall v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 8 Smedes & M. 305, 47 Am. Dec. 85 (1847).

And a sale by a mortgagee of chattels worth much more than the mortgage debt, fraudulently made to a purchaser who participated in the fraud, to defeat the mortgagor's creditors and deprive them of any benefit from the surplus, conveys no title as against an attaching creditor of the mortgagor. Collingsworth v. Bell (Kan.) 43 Pac. 252 (1896).

And a sale of lands under a mortgage to the state to secure a loan from the sinking fund, and an agreement between the mortgagor and the purchaser for the purpose of delaying the mortgagor's creditors, which purpose was known to the purchaser, that he should not reinstate the mortgage but should hold the land in trust for the mortgagor and permit him to redeem it whenever his relations with his creditors would allow him to do so with safety, and that the mortgagor should pay the purchaser whatever amount the latter might pay the state for interest, which he did for a time, when the purchaser paid the amount due the state and re-

Direct proof of a combination in a conveyance to defraud creditors cannot in general be expected, but from all the circumstances attending the transaction the court may infer the conveyance to be fraudulent, and the conveyance of all the vendor's property, especially when secretly made, will be held fraudulent as to creditors.

Bradley v. Buford, Sneed (Ky.) 12, 2 Am. Dec. 703; Gollober v. Martin, supra.

Messrs. Amos Green & Son for defendant in error.

Bierer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Kansas Moline Plow Company brought suit in the district court of Oklahoma county on the 11th day of September, 1893, against J. R. Sherman, to recover the sum of $1,821.76, in which amount the plaintiff claimed ceived a deed,—is fraudulent and void as to the mortgagor's creditors, who are entitled to have the property applied to the payment of other debts without refunding the amount paid by the purchaser. Musselman v. Kent, 33 Ind. 452 (1870).

Any disposition of property for a present consideration which was liable for a debt then existing, made to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor, all of the parties to the transaction having knowledge of and participating in the fraudulent purpose, is fraudulent and void as to such creditor, whether between individuals or a partnership and a third party, or between the partners themselves; and the exemption laws furnish no protection to the grantee under such circumstances. Aiken v. Steiner, 98 Ala. 355 (1892).

So, an assignee of a judgment against one who conveys away his lands, rendered subsequent to the transfer but based upon a claim which arose antecedent thereto, may pursue any property for the payment thereof belonging to the grantor and liable thereto, unless transferred to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. Schaferman v. O'Brien, 28 Md. 565, 92 Am. Dec. 708 (1868).

And it is sufficient for a creditor assailing a transfer to show that the purchaser was aiding and assisting the vendor in perpetrating a fraud, or that in making the purchase he himself entertained the same fraudulent intent. Starin v. Kelly, 88 N. Y. 418 (1882).

Where the evidence is conflicting as to the participation by the vendee in the fraud of his vendor, the determination of the question is for the jury. Anderson v. Warner, 5 Ill. App. 416 (1879); State, Parrick, v. Keeler, 49 Mo. 548 (1872).

And the court cannot tell the jury, in an action to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent as against creditors, what facts are sufficient to justify them in inferring fraud under a statute making the question of fraudulent intent a question of fact. Leasure v. Coburn, 57 Ind. 274 (1877).

II. What constitutes participation.

Some of the cases have acted upon the rule that in order to render a sale of property fraudulent as to the creditors of the vendor, it must appear, not only that the purchaser knew the vendor was designing to defraud his creditors, but also that he participated in the fraud by entering into the common design entertained on his part to defraud his creditors.

This was expressly held in Anderson v. Warner, 5 Ill. App. 416 (1879), and Chandler v. Colcord, 1 Okla. 260 (1893).

And in Erb v. Cole, 31 Ark. 554 (1876) it was held that a sale made by one who was indebted at the time and did not intend to apply the money received to the payment of his debts, is not invalid as to creditors, where the purchaser did not participate in his fraudulent intent by purchasing with a view to aid and abet it.

And in Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1846), it was held that the vendee's knowledge of the vendor's fraudulent intent is not conclusive evidence of a similar intent upon his part, and the question as to the concurrence in such intent is one of fact for the jury and is the main fact in the issue.

And the same rule was laid down in Brown v. Smith, 7 B. Mon. 361 (1847).

So, quite a number of cases have seemed to require the concurrence of participation with knowledge or notice of the fraudulent intent of a vendor to justify the setting aside of a transfer as against creditors.

Thus, to render a conveyance void for fraud upon creditors, it is necessary that the grantee should have had knowledge of and in some way participated in the fraud. Fraser v. Passage, 63 Mich. 551 (1886).

And a fraudulent purpose on the part of a vendor will not affect the vendee unless he had knowledge of and participated in it. Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522 (1875); Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176 (1884); Grunsky v. Parlin (Cal.) 42 Pac. 575 (1895); Pierson v. Tom, 1 Tex. 577 (1847); Mathews v. Reinhardt, 149 Ill. 635 (1893); Violett v. Violett, 2 Dana, 323 (1834).

So, a sale for an adequate price will not be annulled as in fraud of creditors, unless it appears that the purchaser knew of the insolvency of the vendor and bought with the intent to assist him in defrauding his creditors. Bastian v. Christesen, 34 La. Ann. 883 (1882).

And a vendee of a stock of goods, to whom they were conveyed with the intent upon the part of the vendor to defraud his creditors, cannot be held chargeable as trustee unless he had knowledge of the design of the vendor and aided in carrying it into execution. Blodgett v. Chaplin, 48 Me. 322 (1861).

And a conveyance founded upon a valuable consideration will not be set aside on behalf of creditors because of fraud of the grantor in which the grantee did not participate and of which he had no knowledge. Pickett v. Pipkin, 64 Ala. 520 (1879); Bradley v. Ragsdale, 64 Ala. 559 (1879); Partelo v. Harris, 26 Conn. 480 (1857); Reiger v. Davis, 67 N. C. 185 (1872).

But the prevailing rule would seem to be that adopted by the principal case overruling Chandler v. Colcord, 1 Okla. 260 (1893), that in case of sales made to one not a creditor, taking the transfer with knowledge or notice of the vendor's fraudulent intent, constitutes in itself a participation in such fraudulent intent which will invalidate the transfer.

Thus, fraud may be imputed to parties to a purchase, either by direct co-operation in the original design at the time of its concoction, or by constructive co-operation from notice of it, and carrying the design upon such notice into operation. Maguiac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 8 L. ed. 709 (1833).

And a purchase by one who knows that the vendor by the sale intends to defraud his creditors makes the vendee a participant in such fraudulent intent and invalidates the sale. Walcott v. Brander, 10 Tex. 419 (1853); Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891); Ziegler v. Carter Bros. 94 Ala. 291 (1891); Reeves v. Skipper, 94 Ala. 407 (1891); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861).

Though he takes immediate and open possession. Robinson v. Holt, 39 N. H. 557, 75 Am. Dec. 233 (1859).

And a purchaser to whose notice an unlawful purpose on the part of the vendor is brought, and who assents to the conveyance made in pursuance

J. R. Sherman was indebted to it upon certain promissory notes and an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to J. R. Sherman. The next day an order of attachment was issued in the case, and the property in controversy levied upon. G. W. Sherman, by leave of court, interpleaded in the cause, claiming that he was the owner of the goods attached, by virtue of a purchase made from J. R. Sherman on the 6th day of September, 1893. Upon issues being formed upon this interplea, a trial was had before the court and a jury, and a verdict and judgment given and rendered for the interpleader, G. W. Sherman, for the value of the property and damages, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The evidence given upon the trial of the case is quite voluminous, and it is unnecessary to give it in detail. It is sufficient to thereof, is a participator in the fraudulent purpose and derives no title under it to the prejudice of other creditors. Rencher v. Wynne, 86 N. C. 269 (1882).

To establish a fraudulent transfer, knowledge or notice by the grantee of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the grantor must be shown, which will be sufficient to charge him with participation in it. Hoyt & Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523 (1887).

And a purchaser will be held to be a participator in the seller's fraud if he had notice of it and still dealt with him, thereby affording him means to make his fraudulent efforts against his creditors successful. Christian v. Greenwood, supra.

And a debtor, although possessed of ample means to satisfy all demands against him, may be guilty of a fraudulent intent in selling his property, as by converting it into money for the express purpose of putting it beyond the reach of his creditors, and the vendee purchasing with knowledge of such intent or notice of facts calculated to put a reasonable man on inquiry, even though for a cash consideration, is a participator in the fraud. Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891).

And a fraudulent intent on the part of a seller not participated in by the purchaser will avoid a sale as to creditors, under How. (Mich.) Stat. § 6190, making a sale of personal property fraudulent as to creditors where possession is retained in the vendor unless shown to have been made in good faith. Such participation is only necessary where a sale followed by an actual change of possession is attacked. Kipp v. Lamoreaux, 81 Mich. 299 (1890).

So, it is sufficient to invalidate a sale made with intent to defraud creditors that the purchaser knew of such intent. It is not necessary that he should have also been privy to the vendor's fraud. Dougherty v. Cooper, 77 Mo. 528 (1883).

Or that he should have purchased with the intention of aiding the vendor in a fraudulent design as against creditors in order to render the conveyance fraudulent. It is sufficient if he had notice of the fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor. Cowling v. Estes, 15 Ill. App. 255 (1884).

Or that he had knowledge of such facts as should charge him with notice of such intent. Lyons v. Hamilton, 69 Iowa, 47 (1886); Jones v. Hetherington, 45 Iowa, 681 (1877); Kellogg v. Aherin, 48 Iowa, 299 (1877); Williamson v. Wachenheim, 58 Iowa, 277 (1882); Bedford v. Penny, 58 Mich. 424 (1885); Hough v. Dickinson, Id. 89 (1885).

And it is not necessary to show an actual agreement between a vendor and purchaser that the latter would aid the former to defraud his creditors. Brittain v. Crowther, 54 Fed. Rep. 295, 12 U. S. App. 148 (1893).

Or an actual participation in the fraud of a vendor on the part of a vendee; if he knew of such fraudulent intent or had knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicion of a prudent man and to put him upon inquiry, it is sufficient to invalidate the conveyance though the transfer was for a valuable consideration. Mills v. Howeth, 19 Tex. 257, 70 Am. Dec. 331 (1851).

A combination or confederacy between a vendor and purchaser to hinder or delay creditors is not necessary to invalidate the sale. It is sufficient if an intent such as the statute prohibits prompted the parties in making the transfer, in which case it is immaterial whether a valuable consideration had been paid or not. Burgert v. Borchert, 59 Mo. 80 (1875).

The intent to defraud creditors will be presumed where the parties knew that such would be the effect of the conveyance. Nichols v. Nichols, 61 Vt. 426 (1889).

So, the fraudulent intent of a grantor is distinct and separate from such an intent on the part of the grantee, and may be proved by declarations and admissions of the grantor though unknown to the grantee, but the conveyance will not be set aside as fraudulent without proof of knowledge on the part of the grantee from which an intent on his part may be inferred. Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 89, 22 Am. Dec. 400 (1831).

And where an attaching creditor seeks to set aside a sale by his debtor of the attached goods, on the ground of fraud, it is not necessary to establish a fraudulent intent on the part of the purchaser; but it must be shown that the debtor had such intent and that the purchaser had notice thereof or of such facts as should have put him upon inquiry which would have led to such knowledge. Spaulding v. Adams, 63 Iowa, 436 (1884).

So, a sale made with intent to defraud creditors is invalid, where the purchaser knew of such intent at the time of the purchase. Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876); Carter Bros. v. Coleman, 82 Ala. 177 (1886); Carter v. O'Bryan (Ala.) 16 So. 894 (1895); Watts v. Kilburn, 7 Ga. 356 (1849); Fishel v. Lockard, 52 Ga. 632 (1874); Ruffing v. Tilton, 12 Ind. 260 (1859); Phillips v. Reitz, 16 Kan. 396 (1876); Hathaway v. Brown, 18 Minn. 414 (1872); Frederick v. Allgaier, 88 Mo. 598 (1886); Greenwell v. Nash, 13 Nev. 287 (1878); Allison v. Hagan, 12 Nev. 38 (1877); Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & F. Co. 25 Or. 15 (1893); Coolidge v. Heneky, 11 Or. 327 (1883); Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 584 (1850); Garahy v. Bayley, 25 Tex. Supp. 294 (1860); Dodd v. Gaines, 82 Tex. 429 (1891); Oppenheimer v. Halff, 68 Tex. 409 (1887); Hadock Bros. v. Hill, 75 Tex. 193 (1889); Barties v. Gibson, 17 Fed. Rep. 293 (1883).

And is sufficient to avoid a sale without any proof whatever of an actual fraudulent intent upon the part of the vendee. Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89 (1885).

And though the latter had no desire or purpose whatever to defraud them. Jordan v. Collins (Ala.) 18 So. 137 (1895); Edgell v. Lowell, 4 Vt. 405 (1832).

And it is sufficient to invalidate the sale, to show that the purchaser had notice of the vendor's intent to defraud his creditors. DeWalt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892); Bush v. Collins, 35 Kan. 535 (1886); Chaffe v. Gill, 43 La. Ann. 1054 (1891); Hathaway v. Brown, 18 Minn. 414 (1872); Burley v. Marsh, 11 Neb. 291 (1881); Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371 (1818); McKinnon v. Reliance Lumber Co. 63 Tex. 30 (1885); Blum v. Simpson, 71 Tex. 628 (1888); Barker v. Phillips, 11 Rob. (La.) 190 (1845).

Notice to a purchaser of property from a debtor, who sells with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, of his fraudulent intent, is per se evidence of mala fides and renders the sale invalid. Hanchett v. Goetz, 25 Ill. App. 445 (1887).

And a sale made for the fraudulent purpose of state, briefly, that there is evidence tending to show that J. R. Sherman engaged in the hardware and implement business in Oklahoma City in July, 1892, having purchased a stock of a former merchant; that on the 6th day of September, 1893, he was largely indebted to various creditors, a part of which indebtedness was falling due and was unpaid. G. W. Sherman, a brother of J. R. Sherman, who had been residing in Northern Ohio, after some correspondence with J. R. Sherman, came to Oklahoma City, during the latter part of August, 1893, and went into his brother's store, where he clerked for a couple of weeks before September 6, 1893. He brought with him from Ohio some $600 or $700, and with little, if any, other visible means, knowing that his brother was in-defeating the vendor's creditors is invalid as against such creditors, though made for an adequate and full consideration, where the grantee knowingly assists in effectuating such fraudulent intent or even has notice thereof. Beidler v. Crane, 135 Ill. 92 (1890); Millington v. Hill, 47 Ark. 301 (1886).

Thus, one who purchases from a debtor who converts his property into money because it is more easily secreted, intending to put it out of the reach of his creditors, with knowledge of such object on the part of the seller, obtains no title as against creditors. Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & F. Co. 25 Or. 15 (1893); Deering v. Collins, 38 Mo. App. 23 (1889).

And a sale by an insolvent debtor pending suit, of personal property which he has removed to another state for the purpose of defeating a creditor, to one who has full knowledge of the fraudulent purpose for which it is removed, is void as against creditors. Watts v. Kilburn, 7 Ga. 356 (1849); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861).

And the sale by a debtor of his goods with the purpose to defraud his creditors, made with the knowledge of the vendee, taking the vendee's note for a balance remaining unpaid, payable at a future day, may be treated by a creditor as void; and he may subject the goods sold to the payment of his claim or compel the fraudulent vendee to account for the purchase price, but he cannot have both remedies. Bradford v. Beyer, 17 Ohio St. 388 (1867).

So, where a husband's conveyance to his wife is executed with a fraudulent intent, and the wife with knowledge of his purpose accepts the benefit of the act and claims under it, the conveyance is invalidated as against creditors, though she pays a fair consideration. Peeler v. Peeler, 109 N. C. 628 (1891).

And a transfer of property made for the purpose of defeating an allowance made against the vendor of counsel's fees in an action for a divorce pending against him is invalid as against the person entitled thereto, where the purchaser knew of such intent at the time of his purchase though he paid a full consideration therefor. Garesche v. MacDonald, 103 Mo. 1 (1890).

So, one who purchases certain real estate from his brother, who is in embarrassed circumstances, giving his notes therefor, with knowledge that the object of the grantor was to delay and defraud his creditors, and afterwards, and during the pendency of an action by a creditor who had attached the land as that of the grantor, conveys the same to his wife, taking her notes, is not a bona fide purchaser who will be protected against creditors, and the subsequent sale to the wife is not a bona fide sale. Savage v. Hazard, 11 Neb. 323 (1881).

And the purchase of lands from a defaulting treasurer by his brother living in the same county and having an office in the same courthouse, and knowing that the land was purchased with the county's money and held in secret trust, is invalid as against creditors of such defaulter, and especially so as against sureties who had been compelled to make good the very money that was paid for such land. Fulkerson v. Sappington, 104 Mo. 472 (1891).

And a bill in equity will lie under the Pennsylvania act providing that all the debts of a decedent shall be a lien upon his real estate for a period of five years after his death, on the part of creditors against a purchaser from a decedent in his lifetime whose purchase was not bona fide but made with knowledge of the fraudulent intent of his grantor, though such creditors had not reduced their claims to judgments; and the court will decree the conveyance void and that the lands conveyed shall be subject to their debts. Fowler's Appeal, 87 Pa. 449 (1878).

And a distribution by a debtor in a weak state of mind of the whole of his property among his children, partly in consideration of annuities for his life, partly by voluntary assignment, and partly by pecuniary gifts, is void as against creditors, under the statute of 13 Eliz. chap. 5, where the children were aware at the time that creditors' claims would be defeated, though it did not appear that the debtor had any such intention. Cornish v. Clark, L. R. 14 Eq. 184, 42 L. J. Ch. 14, 26 L. T. N. S. 494, 20 Week. Rep. 897 (1872).

So, a complaint to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made for a valuable consideration which does not aver a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, and that the grantee had notice thereof, is demurrable. Willis v. Thompson, 93 Ind. 62 (1883).

The absence of such knowledge or notice, however, is almost, if not quite, universally recognized as a complete protection to the purchaser.

Thus, in order to set aside a transfer made for a valuable consideration as fraudulent as against creditors the grantor must not only have entertained an intent to defraud them but the purchaser must have had knowledge or notice thereof. Grimes v. Hill, 15 Colo. 359 (1890); Kenney v. Dow, 10 Mart. (La.) 577, 13 Am. Dec. 342 (1822); Seixas v. Citizens' Bank, 38 La. Ann. 424 (1886); Gamble v. Harris, 5 Del. Ch. 512 (1884); Groff v. Cooper, 6 Houst. (Del.) 36 (1880); Kyger v. The F. Hull Skirt Co. 34 Ind. 249 (1870); First Nat. Bank v. Carter, 89 Ind. 317 (1883); McCormick v. Hyatt, 33 Ind. 546 (1870); Willis v. Thompson, 93 Ind. 62 (1883); Hutchinson v. Watkins, 17 Iowa, 475 (1864); French v. Reel, 70 Iowa, 122 (1886); Temple v. Smith, 13 Neb. 513 (1882); Miller v. Lacey, 7 Houst. (Del.) 8 (1884); Weis Bros. v. Dittman, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 35 (1893); Hickman v. Trout, 83 Va. 478 (1887); Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. (Va.) 282, 15 Am. Dec. 756 (1826); Goshorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717 (1881); Hopkins v. Langton, 30 Wis. 379 (1872); Hooser v. Hunt, 65 Wis. 71 (1886); Bollman v. Lucas, 22 Neb. 797 (1888).

But a purchase from a vendor who acted with intent to defraud his creditors must, to be protected, have been, not only without knowledge of such fraudulent intent, but also without notice or grounds for reasonable suspicion of such intent. Nicol v. Crittenden, 55 Ga. 497 (1875).

A grantee in a fraudulent deed is not affected by the fraud unless it be shown that he co-operated in the making thereof or took with notice of the intended fraud. Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zeigler, 58 Ala. 221 (1877); Edwards v. Reid, 39 Neb. 645 (1894); Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northrup, 22 N. J. Eq. 58 (1871); Savage v. Knight, 92 N. C. 493, 53 Am. Rep. 423 (1885); Cannon v. Young, 89 N. C. 264 (1883); Durfee v. Pavitt, 14 Minn. 424 (1869).

In order to defeat the deed of a purchaser from one who conveys lands with a fraudulent intent as against creditors, the vendee must have had notice debted to various creditors in amounts which he states he believed to be about $2,500, he purchased the entire stock of goods of his brother, which was all the visible assets his brother had, and all the property subject to execution, although J. R. Sherman states that he had notes in the bank, uncollected, and some in his own possession, amounting to several thousand dollars. An invoice hurriedly made, and without attracting the attention of the clerks in the store, up to the very date of the alleged transfer of the stock of goods, amounted to about $4,000, and the stock and about $600 worth of notes were transferred by contract and bill of sale to G. W. Sherman, in consideration of the payment of $600 in cash and of eight notes (though J. R. Sherman says he does not know whether of the intent, or have participated in the fraud. Henderson v. Henderson, 55 Mo. 534 (1874); Preston v. Turner, 36 Iowa, 671 (1873).

A conveyance cannot be disturbed as against the grantee unless he participated in the fraud of the grantor so far at least as to have knowledge of the fraudulent intent. Steele v. Ward, 25 Iowa, 535 (1868); Leach v. Francis, 41 Vt. 670 (1869); Myers v. Tyson (Kan.) 43 Pac. 91 (1896).

So, a purchaser for a good consideration without notice of fraud will be protected against his vendor's creditors although the conveyance was made with intent on his part to defraud them. Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876); Lehman v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 192 (1880); Galbreath v. Cook, 30 Ark. 417 (1875); Massie v. Enyart, 32 Ark. 257 (1877); Lee v. Abbe, 2 Root, 359, 1 Am. Dec. 78 (1796); Colbert v. Sutton, 5 Del. Ch. 294 (1880); DeWalt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892); Fishel v. Lockard, 52 Ga. 632 (1874); Spicer v. Robinson, 73 Ill. 519 (1874); Palmer v. Henderson, 20 Ind. 297 (1863); Bunnell v. Witherow, 29 Ind. 123 (1867); Hutchinson v. Horn, 1 Ind. 363, 50 Am. Dec. 470 (1849); Studabaker v. Langard, 79 Ind. 320 (1881); Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. 176 (1872); Leen Kee v. Smith Bros. 35 La. Ann. 518 (1883); Hollister v. Loud, 2 Mich. 309 (1852); Eureka Iron & S. Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489 (1887); Durkee v. Chambers, 57 Mo. 575 (1874); Dougherty v. Cooper, 77 Mo. 528 (1883); State v. Mason, 112 Mo. 378 (1892); Hill v. Taylor, 125 Mo. 331 (1894); Fury v. Kempin, 9 Mo. App. 30 (1880), 79 Mo. 477 (1883); Smith v. Schmitz, 10 Neb. 600 (1880); Crabb v. Morrissey, 31 Neb. 161 (1891); Holmes v. Clark, 48 Barb. 237 (1867); Ruhl v. Phillips, 48 N. Y. 125, 8 Am. Rep. 522 (1871); Jackson v. Glaze, 3 Okla. 143 (1895); Thompson v. Lee, 3 Watts & S. 479 (1842); Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. (Va.) 282, 15 Am. Dec. 756 (1826); Leman v. Borden, 83 Tex. 620 (1892); Maddox v. Dabney (Tex.) 27 S. W. 901 (1894); Howe Mach. Co. v. Claybourn, 6 Fed. Rep. 438 (1881); Hinds v. Keith, 57 Fed. Rep. 10, 13 U. S. App. 222 (1893); Astor v. Wells, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 466, 4 L. ed. 616 (1819); Prewit v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22, 26 L. ed. 360 (1880); Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252 (1821).

In Studabaker v. Langard, supra, Rhodes v. Green, 36 Ind. 7 (1871), infra, VIII., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the vendee had actual notice of the vendor's fraud.

The title of a bona fide purchaser of lands for a valuable consideration is unassailable, whatever may have been the motives or intentions of the grantor in making the conveyance, where he had no notice of any fraudulent intent. Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628, 26 Am. Rep. 405 (1878).

And rights of creditors of a fraudulent vendor to avoid the sale cannot be exercised against one who, without notice of the fraud, has in good faith purchased the property from the fraudulent vendee. Comey v. Pickering, 63 N. H. 126 (1884).

And one who purchases from a vendor, who entertains the intent to defraud his creditors, who pays a valuable consideration and has no notice of such intent, is a bona fide purchaser though he holds by an executory contract only, and not by deed. Studabaker v. Langard, supra.

So, the secret intention of a husband to defraud his wife in the sale of community property does not affect a purchaser who had no knowledge of such intention. Smitheal v. Smith (Tex.) 31 S. W. 422 (1895).

And a conveyance of land by a husband to his wife, for which she takes land in exchange, will not be set aside as fraudulent and void as against the husband's creditors in the absence of evidence that she knew of her husband's insolvency or indebtedness. Mehlhop v. Pettibone, 54 Wis. 652 (1882).

And a conveyance by a husband through a third person to his wife will not be set aside as fraudulent at the instance of judgment creditors, where it appears that the conveyance was for a good consideration and that she was innocent of fraud or notice of any intended fraud on the part of her grantor; and a refusal to nonsuit such judgment creditors is error, though as against creditors the conveyance might be converted into a mortgage where such relief would not be inconsistent with the case made by the complaint. Truesdell v. Sarles, 104 N. Y. 164 (1887).

So, a bona fide purchaser without notice, of a promissory note and mortgage given to secure it, who buys before the debt becomes due, is protected against a defense that the mortgage was made by the debtor in anticipation of bankruptcy and to defraud creditors. Murray v. Jones, 50 Ga. 109 (1873).

And a bill of sale of chattels to one who agrees to advance capital and property and carry on business with them and employ the vendor at a fixed rate, made with intent upon the part of the vendor to defraud his creditors, will not be set aside as fraudulent where that object was unknown to the vendee. Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 150 (1869).

So, one who has money in the hands of another by whom a conveyance is made to her, charging her with the consideration on his books which she afterwards accepts, and which is in accordance with her desires, is a bona fide purchaser for a sufficient consideration, though it does not appear that she authorized the conveyance, where she has no actual knowledge of the grantor's intent to defraud creditors. Des Moines Ins. Co. v. Lent, 75 Iowa, 522 (1888).

And a finding that a vendee purchased in good faith will not be disturbed where the evidence tends to show that he had no information of his vendor's insolvent condition, and that the price paid was the full and fair valuation of the property purchased, though the evidence in some parts was sharply conflicting. Grunsky v. Parlin (Cal.) 42 Pac. 575 (1895).

In Hildreth v. Sands, 2 Johns. Ch. 35 (1815), however, it was said that a deed fraudulent upon the part of the grantor may be set aside though the grantee is a bona fide purchaser and ignorant of the fraud.

But in Sands v. Hildreth, 14 Johns. 493 (1817), which was the same case on appeal, the statement of the chancellor in the court below that there would be great difficulty in supporting a fraudulent deed, though the grantee was innocent, was said to be unnecessary to the decisions of the case, and the court expressed itself as inclining to a different opinion.

Where a debtor is entitled to a conveyance of a legal title to land, but abstains from receiving it under an agreement with the person in possession that it shall remain in him in order that it may not be made subject to the payment of his existing debts, the land may be regarded as conveyed with there were eight or nine) of $500 each, due in successive payments, one each two months, beginning two months from the date of the sale. The stock was transferred to G. W. Sherman, he giving back to his brother a chattel mortgage thereon to secure these deferred payments. J. R. Sherman remained in and about the store, transacting business, to all appearances, as before, and made purchases of goods, which were charged to him, the same as before, excepting that G. W. Sherman employed the clerks. Before the goods were attached G. W. Sherman paid from the sales of the goods $300 additional in cash, and subsequently, and before the trial, turned back to his brother the accounts intent to defraud, and as subject to execution. Pennington v. Clifton, 11 Ind. 162 (1858).

III. Effect of payment of full consideration.

The payment by a purchaser of a fair consideration for the property purchased affords strong evidence of the good faith of the transaction, and while not conclusive it requires clear evidence of the existence of a fraudulent intent to overcome the presumption of honest motives arising therefrom. Nugent v. Jacobs, 103 N. Y. 125 (1886).

And an agreement by a vendee to pay a full price for the property purchased is a circumstance tending to repel an inference of fraud from other circumstances, and to show that the transaction was fair. Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848).

A sale made with intent upon the part of the vendor to defraud his creditors is not invalidated against the vendee thereby where he purchased in good faith and for a sufficient consideration. Jones v. Simpson, 116 U. S. 609, 29 L. ed. 742 (1885).

And a conveyance made upon an adequate consideration will not be avoided unless it appears that it was made with an actual fraudulent intent upon the part of the grantor, and that the grantee was a party to the fraud. Union Bank v. Toomer, 2 Hill, Eq. 27.

The payment by a purchaser of an adequate consideration, however, does not show an absence of knowledge on his part that his vendor made the conveyance to delay and defraud his creditors. Wood v. Chambers, 20 Tex. 247, 70 Am. Dec. 382.

Though evidence bearing upon the question of the good faith of the transaction, it is not conclusive. It constitutes merely one circumstance to be weighed in connection with others that may be proved. Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, 85 Hun, 285 (1895).

And a purchaser, in order to be protected against creditors of a fraudulent vendor, must have been not only a purchaser for a valuable consideration but also a bona fide purchaser. Craig v. Zimmerman, 87 Mo. 475, 56 Am. Rep. 466 (1885); Glenn v. Grover, 3 Md. Ch. 29 (1850).

A fraudulent conveyance by a debtor is utterly void as to creditors under the statute of frauds unless made for a valuable consideration to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the fraudulent intent. Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371 (1818).

And in order to sustain a sale made by the vendor with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud his creditors, as against such creditors, it must be made to appear that the purchaser paid a valuable consideration and was not chargeable with notice of his vendor's fraudulent intent. Brown v. Texas Cactus Hedge Co. 64 Tex. 396 (1885).

And participation by a vendee in the fraud of his vendor by accepting from him a conveyance of real estate with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the vendor, renders the conveyance invalid as to such creditors though a full consideration has been paid. Carlton v. King, 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 472, 23 Am. Dec. 295 (1832); Peck v. Land, 2 Ga. 1, 46 Am. Dec. 368 (1847); Chapel v. Clapp, 29 Iowa, 191 (1870); Harrison v. Jaquess, 29 Ind. 208 (1867); Wright v. Brandis, 1 Ind. 336 (1849); Liddle v. Allen, 90 Iowa, 738 (1894); Sweet v. Wright, 57 Iowa, 510 (1881); Biddinger v. Wiland, 67 Md. 359 (1887); Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522 (1875); Johnson v. Sullivan, 23 Mo. 474 (1856); Cason v. Murray, 15 Mo. 378 (1852); Stone v. Spencer, 77 Mo. 356 (1883); Potter v. Stevens, 40 Mo. 229 (1867); Burgert v. Borchert, 59 Mo. 80 (1875); Garesché v. MacDonald, 103 Mo. 1 (1890); Martin v. Estes (Mo.) 28 S. W. 65 (1894); Wake v. Griffin, 9 Neb. 47 (1879); Hedrick v. Strauss, 42 Neb. 485 (1884); Tootle v. Dunn, 6 Neb. 93 (1877); Wickham v. Miller, 12 Johns. 320 (1815); Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887); Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & F. Co. 25 Or. 15 (1893); Peeler v. Peeler, 109 N. C. 628 (1891); Renninger v. Spatz, 128 Pa. 524 (1889); Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 584 (1850); Briscoe v. Clarke, 1 Rand. (Va.) 213 (1822); Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. L. 324, 23 Am. Dec. 140 (1831); Trotter v. Watson, 6 Humph. 509 (1846); Weisiger v. Chisholm, 28 Tex. 780 (1866); Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356 (1883); Fisher v. Shelver, 53 Wis. 498 (1881); Gardinier v. Otis, 13 Wis. 461 (1861); Bott v. Smith, 21 Beav. 511 (1856); Holmes v. Penney, 3 Kay & J. 90, 26 L. J. Ch. 179, 3 Jur. N. S. 80 (1856).

Though an actual change of possession was had. Peck v. Land, supra.

And without reference to the time of the delivery of possession. Stone v. Spencer, supra.

So, where a purchaser makes a purchase with knowledge or notice of a fraudulent intent upon the part of his vendor the transaction is not bona fide and is invalid as to creditors though a full and valuable consideration was given. Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891); Ziegler v. Carter Bros. 94 Ala. 291 (1891); Reeves v. Skipper, 94 Ala. 407 (1891); Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861); Ruffling v. Tilton, 12 Ind. 260 (1859); Howe v. Ward, 4 Me. 195 (1826); Biddinger v. Wiland, 67 Md. 359 (1887); Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848); Burley v. Marsh, 11 Neb. 291 (1881); Robinson v. Holt, 39 N. H. 557, 75 Am. Dec. 234 (1859); Metropolitan Bank v. Durant, 22 N. J. Eq. 35 (1871); Fullerton v. Viall, 42 How. Pr. 294 (1858); Roeber v. Bowe, 26 Hun, 554 (1882); Ashmead v. Hean, supra; Mills v. Howeth, 19 Tex. 257, 70 Am. Dec. 331 (1857); Traylor v. Townsend, 61 Tex. 144 (1884); Humphries v. Freeman, 22 Tex. 45 (1853); Edrington v. Rogers, 15 Tex. 188 (1855); Mosely v. Gainer, 10 Tex. 393 (1853); Walcott v. Brander, Id. 419 (1853); Weisiger v. Chisholm, 22 Tex. 670 (1859); Edgell v. Lowell, 4 Vt. 405 (1832); O'Leary v. Duvall, 10 Wash. 666 (1895); Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883); Bowyer v. Martin, 27 W. Va. 442 (1886); Clements v. Nicholson, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 299, 18 L. ed. 786 (1867); Singer v. Jacobs, 3 McCrary, 638, 11 Fed. Rep. 559 (1882).

And though the purchaser's deed was duly recorded. Edrington v. Rogers, 15 Tex. 188 (1855); Mosely v. Gainer and Walcott v. Brander, supra.

Before suit brought by a creditor. Weisiger v. Chisholm, supra.

And though the grantee had no wish to defraud the creditors of the vendor. Edgell v. Lowell, supra.

A deed in which both grantor and grantee combined to perpetrate a fraud is void whether the consideration be valuable or voluntary. Brooks v. McMeekin, 37 S. C. 285 (1892).

And a transfer made with intent to defraud creditors, participated in by the purchaser, is invalid as against them without reference to the sufficiency of the consideration paid. Harrison v. Jaquess, 29 Ind. 208 (1867); Harden v. Wagner, 22 W. Va. 356 (1883).

which he had purchased with the stock, it is stated, for collection, and J. R. Sherman delivered back to his brother all of the $500 notes excepting three, although no further payments were made thereon. There is also testimony tending to show that about the 9th of September, 1893, the representative of one of the wholesale houses to which J. R. Sherman was indebted presented an account of $165 for payment, but J. R. Sherman told him that he could not pay this account, because he had not gotten his money yet from the sale of the stock. J. R. Sherman denied that the transfer was made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, as did also his brother. The case was submitted to the

And a sale made with intent upon the part of a vendor to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, is invalid if the intent be known to the purchaser or could have been known by the use of ordinary diligence, although the sale was made for a good and valuable consideration. Traylor v. Townsend, 61 Tex. 144 (1884).

So, an assignment of judgments taken by one who had notice of suspicious, unusual, and extraordinary circumstances which would have put him on inquiry, is void as to creditors, though he paid a full consideration. Tantum v. Green, 21 N. J. Eq. 364 (1869).

And a conveyance made with an actual purpose and intent to defraud creditors, present or future, is not valid against them in favor of a grantee who participated in the fraudulent intention, although made for a full consideration and without reference to the amount of property with which the grantor may be possessed. Wadsworth v. Williams, 100 Mass. 126 (1868).

And the fact that a sufficient consideration passed will not validate a deed executed and taken with the fraudulent intent to defeat the vested right of the wife of the grantor in the estate of her husband. Nichols v. Nichols, 61 Vt. 426 (1889).

So, a sale by a son to his mother, made with the intent of placing the property sold beyond the reach of the vendor's creditors, is fraudulent and void as against such creditors, where the mother was privy to the fraudulent design, though she paid a full consideration therefor. Gardinier v. Otis, 13 Wis. 461 (1861).

And a conveyance by a debtor to his brother for the purpose of placing his land beyond the reach of a judgment expected to be recovered in a slander suit then pending, in which fraudulent purpose the brother participated, is fraudulent and void though he paid the full value of the land. Rogers v. Evans, 3 Ind. 574, 56 Am. Dec. 537 (1852).

So a purchaser under a deed fraudulent on its face gets no title, though he paid a full consideration. Palmer v. Giles, 5 Jones, Eq. 75 (1859).

IV. The intent necessary to constitute fraud.

The intent of the parties and the effect of the conveyance upon the creditors of the grantor form the criterion to determine whether such conveyance is fraudulent. Corbitt v. Cutcheon, 79 Mich. 41 (1889).

Good faith in making the purchase is the essential feature in a suit to test the question as to whether a conveyance is fraudulent. Garahy v. Bayley, 25 Tex. Supp. 294 (1860).

The questions as to a purchase from a fraudulent vendor are whether or not the purchaser acted in good faith; if he did he is protected, if not, the goods in his hands are still liable for the debts of their real owner. Lane v. Starkey, 15 Neb. 285 (1883).

And whether the purpose of the grantee was to aid the grantor in perpetrating a fraud upon his creditors. Did he buy recklessly or with guilty knowledge, or, which is the same thing, with such knowledge as would put a prudent man upon inquiry? Howe Mach. Co. v. Claybourn, 6 Fed. Rep. 438 (1881).

And whether it was made bona fide for a valuable consideration, or whether it was fraudulently made as a mere scheme or contrivance for the purpose of delaying, hindering, or defrauding creditors, in which case it would be void. Smith v. Moffatt, 28 U. C. Q. B. 486 (1869).

It would appear that the intent must be an illegal one,—that is, an intent to do or accomplish something that the law does not allow.

Thus, a notice to a grantee which will invalidate the conveyance must be a notice of an intent on the part of the debtor to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors in the legal sense of those words. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1886).

And that an intent such as the statute prohibits prompted the parties in making a transfer is sufficient to invalidate it. Burgert v. Borchert, 59 Mo. 80 (1875).

But a purchase of the property of another by one who is so connected with it and the business in which it is used that he honestly supposes it necessary for the preservation of his business to purchase it, and does it for a full consideration for that reason and with no intent to aid the seller in a fraud upon his creditors, is valid as to the purchaser as against such creditors, though he knew that the object of the seller in making the sale was to defraud his creditors. Root v. Reynolds, 32 Vt. 139 (1859).

And a conveyance which is absolute in terms, made by a debtor with a hope of saving something which his creditors could not reach, not based upon any agreement but upon an expectation that the purchasers would deal honorably with him and give him something if they sold the property at an advance, is not fraudulent as against creditors where they did not know and had no reason to suppose that he was insolvent. Orwig v. Merrill, 69 Iowa, 733 (1886).

And knowledge of a purchaser that the seller is largely in debt, and that if no one would buy his goods his creditors would get their debts out of them, does not invalidate the sale where his object in purchasing was not to delay or hinder creditors but only to procure a good bargain or get something of which he was in want. Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 151 (1869).

In Dewalt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892), however, it was held that a purchase made with knowledge of facts which would put a prudent man upon inquiry and lead him to infer a purpose to defraud creditors, is invalid, though he made the purchase because he considered the property cheap.

It has been held that an attempt to prevent a sacrifice of a debtor's property is not such an intent to delay or defraud creditors as will invalidate a conveyance. Cason v. Murray, 15 Mo. 378 (1852).

And it was held that whether a sale by an embarrassed debtor was bona fide for the purpose of relieving himself from the necessity of a forced sale of his goods or for the mere purpose of protecting them from the claims of creditors, in which latter case it would be fraudulent and void, is a question for the jury. Clark v. Morrell, 21 U. C. Q. B. 596 (1862).

But a conveyance of property made by a debtor in embarrassed circumstances for the purpose of securing it from attachment, the purpose being known to the purchaser, would be void as against creditors, though the debtor might have believed that it would be better for his creditors to make the conveyance and intended that ultimately they jury, evidently, on the theory that the evidence was such as made the question of the existence of fraud a question of fact for the jury to determine. And this theory of the case seems to have been considered proper on both sides,—at least, no objection seems to have been made to the court considering it in this way,—and it was so considered.

The only question raised in the case is as to the correctness of the instructions given by the court to the jury; and it is claimed that the court erred in refusing, on the application of plaintiff, to instruct the jury that, if the transfer was made by J. R. Sherman to defraud his creditors, it was also frandulent as to the vendee, G. W. Sher-should be paid. Kimball v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 441, 50 Am. Dec. 799 (1849).

And a sale by an embarrassed debtor to a friend and relative at an inadequate price and for less than the amount of his debts, after a secret conference, with the intention of protecting his property from being sacrificed by creditors at sales under legal process, will be deemed fraudulent, and can be upheld only as to the consideration paid which was actually applied to the payment of the vendor's debts. Barrow v. Bailey, 5 Fla. 9 (1853).

And substantially the same rule was declared in Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 104 (1875), and Fullerton v. Viall, 42 How. Pr. 294 (1858), in which the intent was to enable the debtor to prefer certain creditors over others.

And a statement by a vendor that his object in making a sale of his property was to enable him to take his time to pay a designated creditor is sufficient to show that his object was to hinder and delay that creditor in the collection of his demand, and will invalidate the transfer where it appears that the purchaser was fully apprised of his object. Allen v. Berry, 40 Mo. 282 (1867).

The mere fact that the vendor intends to prefer a creditor in the use of the proceeds of the sale or that the purchaser knew of such intent, however, will not vitiate the sale. See infra, VII. c, Knowledge of intended preference.

It was held in England that a sale of property for a good consideration is not, either at common law or under the statute of 17 Eliz. chap. 5, fraudulent and void merely because it is made with the intent to defeat an expected execution of a judgment creditor. Wood v. Dixie, 7 Q. B. 892, 9 Jur. 796 (1845); Hale v. Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co. 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 777 (1859).

And in Canada a conveyance made by a debtor to a third party for a valuable consideration and without notice of any fraudulent intent, intended to pass title, was held to be valid under 13 Eliz. chap. 5, notwithstanding the fact that the parties to the transaction intended to defeat a creditor who had obtained judgment. Dalglish v. McCarthy, 19 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 578 (1872).

But the rule in the United States would appear to be different.

Thus, a purchase of property which the sheriff was seeking to subject to the satisfaction of an execution against the vendor with a view to defeat the remedy of creditors is invalid, though a fair price is paid. Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887).

So, a sale of land made by a vendor while an action was pending against him, for the purpose of preventing the collection of an anticipated judgment, is voidable, and will be set aside as to creditors where the purchaser was aware of the pendency of such action and participated with the vendor in his fraudulent purpose. Rogers v. Evans, 3 Ind. 574, 56 Am. Dec. 537 (1852).

And a bill of sale made with the purpose on the part of the vendor of preventing and defrauding the plaintiff, in an action of slander then pending, from reaping any benefit from the judgment, if one should be obtained, of which the vendee in the bill of sale had knowledge and in which he participated, is invalid as against such plaintiff in the slander suit. Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522 (1875).

And a conveyance of land by a husband during the pendency of an action for divorce and alimony, made with intent to defraud his wife of her right to support, is invalid as against the wife where it was received by the grantee with the same fraudulent design. Frakes v. Brown, 2 Blackf. 295 (1830).

And a sale made for the purpose of defeating the recovery of damages for a breach of promise of marriage is fraudulent and void where the purchaser had notice of the fraudulent intent, though the agreement for the sale was made before suit brought for the breach of promise, and an adequate consideration was paid and possession taken and the purchase money applied to the payment of the vendor's debts. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. L. 324 (1831).

So, in Colbert v. Sutton, 5 Del. Ch. 294 (1880), it was held that the knowledge of a purchaser of the existence of a judgment against his vendor does not invalidate the purchase unless he made it with a view to defeat the creditors' execution.

And, a conveyance by a debtor to his brother to avoid paying an anticipated judgment, the bonds taken for which were handed to his son for which the brother conveyed the property to the son, who surrendered the bonds, the property remaining in the possession and control of the debtor, will be deemed to have been made upon a trust for the use of the debtor, and will be held to be fraudulent and void as to creditors. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587 (1882).

And a sale by an embarrassed debtor of all his real estate on the eve of judgments against him to his son-in-law, who had little means and gave a mortgage for the purchase money, who permitted the grantor to remain in possession and exercise control over the property and afterwards took a fraudulent conveyance of his personal property and removed from the county to avoid execution against the grantor, will be held to be invalid as against creditors in the absence of explanation. Jackson, Hooker, v. Mather, 7 Cow. 301 (1827).

So, a conveyance of real estate made with the intent upon the part of the vendor, known to the vendee, to delay, defeat, and hinder a particular creditor from obtaining his debt, though made for a valuable and full consideration, is fraudulent and void as against such creditors. Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 584 (1850).

And an assignment of mortgages with intent to delay and defeat the collection of a particular debt will not be set aside as to the creditor to whom that debt is due, unless the assignee participated in such fraudulent intent or had notice of facts and circumstances from which the fraudulent intent of the assignor was an actual and legal inference. Tantum v. Green, 21 N. J. Eq. 364 (1869).

And knowledge on the part of a purchaser of a general intent on the part of the vendor to defraud creditors will defeat the sale, as well as knowledge of a particular intent to defraud a particular creditor, and a creditor may avail himself of it though he might not have been a creditor at the time of the sale. Jordan v. Collins (Ala.) 18 So. 137 (1895).

So, an intent to defraud creditors, entertained by a vendor and known to the purchaser, is fatal to the validity of the transfer as against creditors, though the fraudulent purpose was secondary and man, if he was in a position where a reasonably prudent man could and would have known of the fraudulent intent of the vendor, and that if the vendee had notice of such facts as would awaken the suspicion of a man of ordinary prudence, and lead him to make inquiry, which, if pursued, would have led to his full knowledge of the fraud of the vendor, he was chargeable with notice of the vendor's fraudulent intent. The plaintiff asked these instructions in different forms, so that the question as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to an instruction of this character is clearly raised. The court refused this request, but gave the instructions in a modified form, to the effect not primary. Louisiana Sugar-Ref. Co. v. Harrison (Tex.) 29 S. W. 500 (1894).

And a sale made by a debtor in failing circumstances, intending to use a part of the proceeds in payment of a certain debt, but intending further to hinder, delay, or defraud other creditors and not apply the whole to the payment of his debts, of which intent the purchaser had notice, is fraudulent and void. Sellers v. Bailey, 29 Mo. App. 174 (1888).

So, the fact that the result of a fraudulent deed is to secure the payment of a valuable debt equal or greater in amount than the property conveyed does not remove from the transaction the taint of fraud as against a grantee chargeable with notice of the wrongful intent. Cox v. Miller, 54 Tex. 16 (1880).

And although a loan with an agreement to secure a creditor, if the debtor finds himself failing, may be upheld, if there be the further purpose to give the debtor false credit and induce a creditor to rely upon it for payment, the conveyance, pursuant to such understanding, which hinders and defeats creditors, will be inoperative and void. Rencher v. Wynne, 86 N. C. 269 (1882).

V. To what conveyances the rule applies.

a. Generally.

It seems to have been generally assumed and tacitly admitted that the rule requiring participation by the purchaser in the fraudulent intent of the vendor to invalidate the transfer under statutes prohibiting fraudulent conveyances applies to all conveyances deemed to have been made for a valuable consideration. The question has arisen, however, with reference to a few peculiar classes or transfers, though it has usually taken the form of a question as to whether the transfer was one for value requiring such participation to invalidate it.

b. Marriage settlements.

A promise of marriage is a good and valuable consideration, sufficient to support a transfer by a man to his intended wife which will confer title upon her, notwithstanding his intent to defraud creditors, where she has no notice of such intent. Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 8 L. ed. 709 (1833); Bunnell v. Witherow, 29 Ind. 123 (1867).

And a deed made in consideration of marriage is valid as against existing creditors in the absence of bad faith upon the part of the wife, though not delivered until after the marriage is consummated. Wood & H. Bank v. Read (Mo.) 33 S. W. 176 (1895).

In order to render an antenuptial settlement a fraud upon creditors, it is necessary that both parties should concur in or have cognizance of the intended fraud. Magniac v. Thompson, supra; Prewit v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22, 26 L. ed. 360 (1880); Bunnell v. Witherow, supra.

A conveyance in consideration of a future marriage makes the wife a purchaser within the statute of Elizabeth, and is good as against creditors if made bona fide and without notice on her part of fraud on the part of the grantor. Magniac v. Thompson, Baldw. C. C. 344 (1831).

And an antenuptial settlement made by a man upon his future wife in consideration of marriage is good against his creditors unless made with intent to defraud them and the intended wife was cognizant of his fraud, however much he may have been indebted, and though it conveys his whole estate. Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628, 26 Am. Rep. 405 (1878).

A conveyance in consideration of marriage will not be presumed to be fraudulent either as to existing or subsequent purchasers, but it may be set aside and held void for actual fraud, though both parties must concur in it. Bonser v. Miller, 5 Or. 110 (1873).

And a conveyance of land made to an intended wife in consideration of her agreement to marry the grantor is not invalidated in the hands of the grantee by the fact that it was made with intent to defraud creditors, and the grantee became aware of such intent before the marriage was consummated. Prignon v. Daussat, 4 Wash. 199 (1892).

And a settlement by an embarrassed and insolvent debtor of the greater part of his estate, made in consideration of marriage, will not be set aside as invalid as against creditors, though the intended wife was aware of his embarrassment, where the marriage was honestly contracted after an engagement of several years. Fraser v. Thompson, 1 Giff. 49, 5 Jur. N. S. 669 (1859).

So, the continued occupation, after marriage by the husband, of land conveyed by him to his intended wife, and her neglect for some years to record the deed, and the mortgaging of the land by the husband and wife for the husband's benefit, do not raise a presumption of a fraudulent intent in making the conveyance. Page v. Kendrick, 10 Mich. 300 (1862).

And a marriage settlement made by one indebted before marriage, given in consideration of the promised marriage and of £10,000, the wife's portion, which was supposed to be more than enough to pay the debts of the settler, conveying all his real estate and likewise his household goods in trust for himself for life, the remainder to his wife for life, the remainder to his sons, which was approved by the master in chancery, the wife being a ward in chancery, the husband continuing in possession after the marriage,—is good as against creditors, and trustees therein are entitled to the possession of the goods. Cadogan v. Kennet, 2 Cowp. 432 (1776).

And an antenuptial settlement by an insolvent trader in which he covenanted to pay £500 to trustees to be held by them in trust for such persons as the intended wife should appoint, and subject thereto in trust for the intended wife, for her separate use and for the husband for life and then in trust for the survivor, including also certain property belonging to the intended wife, is good as against creditors upon his subsequent bankruptcy, where the intended wife was wholly unaware of the intended husband's insolvency. Re McBurnie, 1 De G. M. & G. 441 (1852).

But a settlement made by a debtor upon a woman with whom he had previously cohabited, after which he married her, the whole transaction having been made with intent to defraud his creditors, the wife being implicated in the transaction, is fraudulent and void as against such creditors. Bulmer v. Hunter, L. R. 8 Eq. 46, 38 L. J. Ch. 543, 20 L. T. N. S. 942 (1869).

And a settlement by an insolvent upon a woman that the jury could not find that the transfer was fraudulent and void as against G. W. Sherman unless they should find from a preponderance of the evidence that he had notice or knowledge of the fraudulent intent on the part of J. R. Sherman. It is claimed by plaintiff in error, and it is not disputed by the defendant in error, that it was the view of the learned judge who tried the case below that it was entitled to the instruction asked, but that it could not be given because of the decision of this court in the case of Chandler v. Colcord, 1 Okla. 260, where it was held erroneous to give the jury just such an instruction. If we considered the decision of Chandler v. Colcord upon this question to be with whom he had previously cohabited for several years and whom he subsequently married, for whom he conveyed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon certain trusts with a joint power of appointment among the children of the marriage, reserving no interest to himself but reserving a power of appointment which was immediately afterwards exercised in favor of an illegitimate daughter, the property remaining in his control, is fraudulent and void as against assignees in bankruptcy upon the issue of a flat in bankruptcy against him. Colombine v. Penhall, 1 Smale & G. 228 (1853).

So, in Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desauss. Eq. 223 (1811), it was held that a marriage settlement made when deeply in debt, covering a greater part of the grantor's property, on the eve of judgments, and not recorded, is void as to creditors.

c. Assignment for creditors.

It is not intended under this head to go into the question as to whether an assignment for the benefit of creditors constitutes a conveyance for a valuable consideration. The only decisions included are those which appear to turn upon the question of the necessity of participation of the assignee or beneficiaries in the fraud of the assignor to invalidate the assignment. Upon this question different courts seem to have arrived at directly opposite conclusions.

Thus, the rule in North Carolina is that the trustees of the beneficiary in a voluntary assignment to secure creditors are not purchasers for a valuable consideration who must know of or participate in the fraudulent intent of the assignor in order to render the transfer invalid. Savage v. Knight, 92 N. C. 493, 53 Am. Rep. 423 (1885).

And a conveyance to a trustee for the benefit of creditors is void if made with intent to defraud any of the vendor's creditors, though the trustee is ignorant of such intent. Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887).

And an assignment by a debtor of what purports to be all his property, ostensibly to provide for the payment of his debts due to creditors, but with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud them or any of them, is fraudulent and void, though neither the trustee nor the cestui que trust had any knowledge of the corrupt intent. Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 197 (1889).

So in Ruhl v. Phillips, 48 N. Y. 125, 8 Am. Rep. 522 (1871), it was held that a sale differs from an assignment in that there is a consideration passing to the vendor from the vendee, who becomes owner of the property in his own right, and the vendor obtains the purchase money, which is liable to the claims of creditors; and although such sales may be made on the part of the vendor with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the title of the vendee is not affected unless he had previous notice or knowledge of the fraudulent intent.

But the opposite rule that the fraudulent intent of the grantor alone will not avoid a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors was held in Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 560 (1849).

And in Wise v. Wimer, 23 Mo. 237 (1856), it was held that fraud in an assignment for the benefit of creditors must be brought home to the assignee in order to invalidate it.

And in Pettit v. Parsons, 9 Utah, 223 (1893), it was held that fraud on the part of an assignor does not vitiate the assignment or affect the rights of the assignee and the beneficiaries of the trust who had no knowledge of the fraud and were in no way connected with it. To have such an effect there must have been a fraudulent contrivance on the part of the assignee or of the persons to be benefited by the assignment.

So, an assignment by a sole surviving partner of an insolvent firm, who is himself insolvent, of partnership assets for the benefit of joint creditors with preferences to some of them, is not rendered void because of the fraudulent omission of such partner from the schedule, of certain partnership property for its own benefit, the assignees and the beneficiaries of the trust being ignorant of the fraud. Emerson v. Senter, 118 U. S. 3, 30 L. ed. 49 (1885).

VI. Necessity of injury to creditors.

The rule in Louisiana is that in order to render a transfer made with intent to defraud creditors fraudulent, it must not only appear that the purchaser participated in the fraud, but it must also be shown that the alienation produced injury to creditors.

This was expressly held in Baudin v. Roliff, 1 Mart. N. S. 165, 14 Am. Dec. 181 (1823); Kenney v. Dow, 10 Mart. (La.) 577, 13 Am. Dec. 342 (1822); Sexias v. Citizens' Bank, 38 La. Ann. 424 (1886).

And in Chaffee v. Gill, 43 La. Ann. 1054 (1891), it was held that a purchaser of property from a debtor whom the purchaser knows to be insolvent, with notice that his purpose in selling was to deprive creditors of their recourse against it, will be set aside as fraudulent, where such purpose actually operates to their injury.

But in other states the rule would seem to be different.

Thus a transfer of property with the purpose on the part of the vendor to convert it into money in order to place it beyond the reach of his creditors, of which the purchaser had notice, either actual or constructive, at the time of the purchase, is not prevented from being fraudulent and void as to creditors by the fact that the vendor was solvent at the time and had sufficient property within reach of his creditors, independently of the goods in controversy, to meet his liabilities. Schmick v. Noel, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 90 (1893); Hudson v. Jordan, 108 N. C. 10 (1891); Wadsworth v. Williams, 100 Mass. 126 (1868).

And a sale of goods made by a debtor for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding his creditors, of which the purchaser had notice at the time of his purchase, does not devest the title to the goods of the vendor as against his creditors though he may have received therefor other property sufficient in value to pay his debts. Wallace v. Butts (Tex.) 31 S. W. 687 (1895).

VII. Knowledge or notice sufficient to put purchaser upon inquiry.

a. Generally.

Of course actual knowledge or notice of the vendee's fraudulent intent is sufficient to invalidate the sale as against creditors. See supra. II., What constitutes participation.

good law, no further consideration of this case would be necessary, but the matter would end at once by affirmance of the judgment of the court below. But we do not believe that the conclusion there reached on the proposition of law here involved was correct, either as a determination of what the law of fraudulent conveyances is in this territory by virtue of the adoption of the laws of another jurisdiction, or from a consideration of the decisions generally upon the question. We would, in fact, were it not for the Chandler v. Colcord decision, consider the question so well settled by the authorities as to make it entirely unnecessary for us to consider the matter at any length. But, this court having decided the law differently

The general rule as to what information short of actual knowledge or notice will be sufficient for that purpose has been variously stated.

Thus, notice to a purchaser of a fraudulent intent of his vendor may be inferred from circumstances that would put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry. Wood v. Elliott (Ky.) 7 S. W. 624 (1888); Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891); De Walt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892); Thompson v. Duff, 19 Ill. App. 75 (1886); Hanchett v. Kimbark, 118 Ill. 121 (1886); Redhead v. Pratt, 72 Iowa, 99 (1887); Phillips v. Reitz, 16 Kan. 396 (1876); Bush v. Collins, 35 Kan. 535 (1886); Martin v. Marshall, 54 Kan. 147 (1894); Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89 (1885); Eureka Iron & S. Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489 (1887); Bedford v. Penny, 58 Mich. 424 (1885); Rupe v. Alkire, 77 Mo. 641 (1883); State, Friedman, v. Purcell (Mo.) 33 S. W. 13 (1895); State, Erhardt, v. Estel, 6 Mo. App. 6 (1878); Temple v. Smith, 13 Neb. 513 (1882); Bollman v. Lucas, 22 Neb. 797 (1888); Dodd v. Gaines, 82 Tex. 429 (1891); Blum v. Simpson, 71 Tex. 628 (1888); Mills v. Howeth, 19 Tex. 257, 70 Am. Dec. 331 (1857); Hadock Bros. v. Hill, 75 Tex. 193 (1889); The Holladay Case, 27 Fed. Rep. 830 (1886); Bartles v. Gibson, 17 Fed. Rep. 293 (1883).

Which inquiry, made with ordinary diligence, would have led to knowledge of such intent. Jones v. Hetherington, 45 Iowa, 681 (1877); Kellogg v. Aherin, 48 Iowa, 299 (1877); Williamson v. Wachenheim, 58 Iowa, 277 (1882); Rindskopf v. Myers, 87 Wis. 80 (1894); Hooser v. Hunt, 65 Wis. 71 (1886).

This is the rule adopted by the principal case.

And the sale will be held fraudulent though the purchaser purchases because he considers the property cheap. De Walt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892).

So, a vendee who purchases property from an insolvent or failing debtor, and pays him money, with knowledge of facts and circumstances of a suspicious nature sufficient to induce inquiry which if pursued would lead to the discovery of such intent, renders aid in consummating the purpose of the debtor sufficient to invalidate his purchase. Carter Bros. v. Coleman, 82 Ala. 177 (1886); Carter v. O'Bryan (Ala.) 16 So. 894 (1895); Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876); Dyer v. Taylor, 50 Ark. 314 (1887).

But in order to invalidate it, fraud must appear on the part of the vendor in making the sale, and knowledge of such fraud on the part of the purchaser at the time of purchasing, or knowledge of such facts and circumstances as ought to have put him upon inquiry and would have led to his ascertaining the truth. Hopkins v. Langton, 30 Wis. 379 (1872); Hooser v. Hunt, 65 Wis. 71 (1886); Lehman v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 192 (1880); Hinds v. Keith, 57 Fed. Rep. 10, 13 U. S. App. 222 (1893).

So, one who might have known of the debtor's intent to defraud his creditors by the exercise of ordinary diligence is not a purchaser in good faith within the statute of frauds. Garahy v. Bayley, 25 Tex. Supp. 294 (1860); Traylor v. Townsend, 31 Tex. 144 (1884); Dodd v. Gaines, 82 Tex. 429 (1891); De Walt v. Doran, 21 D. C. 163 (1892).

But a transfer will not be set aside as fraudulent against creditors unless the vendor intended thereby to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and the vendee knew his intention at the time, or could have known it by the use of ordinary diligence and inquiry. Weis v. Dittman, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 35 (1893).

And that a vendee might have known of the fraudulent intent of his vendor by the exercise of ordinary diligence does not invalidate a sale as to creditors under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2465, providing that the vendee's title shall not be affected unless it appear that he had notice of the fraudulent intent, where knowledge on the part of the vendee of such intent or of any circumstances sufficient to put a reasonably prudent person upon inquiry does not appear. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Shirley (Tex.) 31 S. W. 291 (1895).

So, a purchaser of land is chargeable with notice of a fraudulent intent entertained by his grantor as against a creditor, though he had no actual notice or knowledge thereof, where there were facts within his knowledge which were calculated to arouse his suspicion and put him upon inquiry. Baker v. Bliss, 39 N. Y. 70 (1868).

But a sale by a debtor to one not a creditor, for an adequate consideration, is not invalid as to creditors unless it is made to appear that it was made with intent to defraud them, and that the purchaser participated in such intent or had knowledge of facts calculated to put him on inquiry. Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zeigler, 58 Ala. 221 (1877); Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northrup, 22 N. J. Eq. 58 (1871).

So, all sales made by an insolvent debtor for money are fraudulent and void as to creditors where the purchaser knows or ought to know that the sale is made by the debtor for the purpose of putting the property sold beyond the reach of creditors. Oppenheimer v. Halff, 68 Tex. 409 (1887); Brittain v. Crowther, 54 Fed. Rep. 295, 12 U. S. App. 148 (1893).

And a purchase of property under circumstances which must have suggested to the purchaser that the object of the vendor was to transfer all his property in the state for value actually paid over before it could be attached or seized under a judgment recently obtained, is invalid as against such judgment creditor, although full consideration was paid and the purchaser had no actual notice of such intent. Green v. Tantum, 19 N. J. Eq. 105 (1868).

And that a debtor was indebted and converted the whole of his property liable to execution and sale, and that the vendee had reason to doubt, and did doubt, whether he did not intend to avoid the payment of his debts, are sufficient to render the sale void as to creditors. Avery v. Johann, 27 Wis. 246 (1870).

So, a sale or transfer of property by a debtor to another with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, is void as against creditors where the purchaser has reasonable cause to believe that the transfer is made for that purpose. Hathaway v. Brown, 18 Minn. 414 (1872).

But to make a sale for a valuable consideration invalid as against the purchaser it must appear that he knew that the object of making it was to prejudice the rights of creditors, or that circumstances existed, of which he could not reasonably be ignorant, which indicated a dishonest object of the seller. Miller v. Lacy, 7 Houst. (Del.) 8 (1884).

And a purchaser is not affected by the fraudulent intent of an insolvent vendor unless he purchased with intent to aid him in carrying out his fraudulent design, or had knowledge of it, or notice of such facts or circumstances as would lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that fraud in from what it is contended to be by plaintiff in error, the overruling of our former decision should be attended by such a consideration of the matter as to show that we are not only justified, but are required to do so. The question involved in the Chandler v. Colcord case in point in this was as to the correctness of two instructions given by the probate court, the one of which pertinent to the case at bar is as follows: "First. The court further instructs the jury, that when a transfer of property is made, with intent, on the part of the person making it, to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, and the party to whom the transfer is made had knowledge of the facts and circumstances, from which such fraudulent intent might reasonably fact existed or was intended. Tuteur v. Chase, 66 Miss. 476, 4 L. R. A. 832 (1889).

And a sale by an insolvent debtor for a good consideration, made with intent to defraud his creditors, is not invalid as against a purchaser who did not know of the existence of the debts due by the vendor, or of any fact that would create a suspicion on the part of a prudent man at the time of the sale that the vendor intended to defraud his creditors. Leman v. Borden, 83 Tex. 620 (1892).

Knowledge on the part of a purchaser of facts which are sufficient to put him on inquiry by reasonably exciting a just suspicion as to the honesty of the transaction is sufficient to charge him with notice of the debtor's fraudulent intent. Shealy v. Edwards, 75 Ala. 411 (1883).

And notice of fraud in fact, committed by a vendor to a vendee before payment of the purchase money, is binding upon him; and if the circumstances are such as to put him on inquiry, it will amount in law to notice. Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848).

The same rules are applicable in ascertaining the question as to whether a vendee had notice of the fraud upon the part of his vendor, as are applied for the purpose of determining the bona fides of a holder of a commercial paper. Parker v. Conner, 93 N. Y. 118, 45 Am. Rep. 178 (1883).

And a purchaser from a fraudulent grantor, having sufficient notice to put him upon inquiry as a man of ordinary prudence and experience in business transactions, will not be allowed to protect himself as an innocent purchaser upon the ground of want of notice. Ringgold v. Waggoner, 14 Ark. 69 (1853).

And one who purchases goods under circumstances which would have put a man of common honesty and sagacity upon inquiry is bound to inquire, and if he neglects to do so, he is chargeable with all the facts due inquiry would have developed. Brittain v. Crowther, 54 Fed. Rep. 295, 12 U. S. App. 148 (1893); Walker v. Collins, 50 Fed. Rep. 737, 4 U. S. App. 406 (1892); Rupe v. Alkire, 77 Mo. 641 (1883).

It is sufficient to avoid a sale in favor of creditors if the facts and circumstances within the knowledge of the purchaser are such as to fairly induce the belief that he either knew of the fraudulent purpose of the vendor, or, having good reason to suspect, he purposely refused to make inquiry and remained wilfully ignorant. Singer v. Jacobs, 3 McCrary, 638 (1882).

A purchaser is not chargeable with knowledge of a fraudulent purpose on the part of his vendor, however, merely because he failed to avail himself of an opportunity of making investigation, which if made would have revealed the purpose. It is not his duty to inquire into the motives of the seller unless put upon inquiry. State, Peirce, v. Merritt, 70 Mo. 276 (1879).

And a purchaser from an insolvent is not chargeable with notice of the insolvency, or of his intent to defraud creditors, though reasonable inquiry on his part would disclose the existence thereof, unless the law casts on him the duty of making such inquiry; and such duty exists only when he has knowledge of facts which would naturally and reasonably be calculated to awaken suspicion. Kyle v. Ward, 81 Ala. 120 (1887).

To charge a purchaser with notice of the fraud of his vendor, the circumstances known by him must be such as ought reasonably to have excited his suspicion and led him to inquire. Baker v. Bliss, 39 N. Y. 70 (1868); Dodd v. Gaines, 82 Tex. 429 (1891).

There must appear to be in the nature of the case such a connection between the facts known and the further facts to be discovered that the former may be said to furnish a reasonable and natural clue to the latter. Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 320 (1864).

A purchaser for a full consideration is not chargeable with notice of a fraudulent intent entertained by his vendor where he does not appear to have been acquainted with any fact which might create a well-grounded belief as to the existence of such intent. Stearns v. Gage, 79 N. Y. 102 (1879).

And he is not bound to investigate as to the intent of his vendor until he knows something which would cause a reasonably prudent man, acting in good faith, to investigate the facts. Dodd v. Gaines, supra.

So, mere suspicion on the part of a purchaser that the vendor intends to defraud his creditors by the sale is not sufficient to put him on inquiry or vitiate his purchase. Tuteur v. Chase, 66 Miss. 476, 4 L. R. A. 832 (1889); Simms v. Morse, 4 Hughes, C. C. 579 (1880).

And it must appear that the inquiry suggested would have, if fairly pursued, resulted in the discovery of the defect. Simms v. Morse, supra.

And a general rumor that a particular sale was fraudulent is not sufficient to show notice to the purchaser of the fraud of the vendor, and is not sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry. Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884).

And mere want of caution, as distinguished from fraudulent and wilful blindness upon the part of a purchaser, does not prevent him from being considered as a bona fide purchaser without notice, where there is no fraudulent turning away from a knowledge of the facts which the res gestæ would suggest to a prudent man. Woodworth v. Paige, 5 Ohio St. 70 (1855); Rupe v. Alkire, 77 Mo. 641 (1883).

Whether a purchaser was only unconscious, or, knowing enough to put a prudent man upon inquiry with regard to the purpose of the vendor, was wilfully ignorant, of the facts which he could have learned, is a question for the consideration of the jury. Rupe v. Alkire, supra; Dodd v. Gaines, 82 Tex. 429 (1890).

And a creditor is not put upon inquiry as to his debtor's solvency by the fact that the debtor on the creditor's application was willing to consent to the revival of his judgment so that it might be a lien on real estate acquired by the debtor subsequent to its date. Kemmerer v. Tool, 78 Pa. 147 (1875).

And a purchaser from an insolvent debtor is not as matter of law put upon inquiry and rendered chargeable with constructive notice of the debtor's insolvency or embarrassed condition, where he was offered the privilege of examining the vendor's books, but declined to do so because of his confidence in the debtor personally, though it would be sufficient to go to the jury. Stix v. Keith, 85 Ala. 465 (1888).

Unless a vendor is insolvent, the duty of inquiry by the purchaser would not necessarily arise from and naturally be inferred by an ordinarily cautious person, then such transfer is fraudulent and void as against the rights of the creditors." Concerning this instruction, the court held: "As to the instructions which appear to have been given at the instance of appellee, the first and third were erroneous and should not have been given. A fraudulent intent on the part of a vendor or mortgagor, to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, is not of itself sufficient to defeat the sale or mortgage. It is essential to that end that the vendee, or mortgagee, should participate in that design. The fraudulent intent must be mutual. Meixsell v. Williamson, 35 Ill. 529; Herkelrath v. Stookey, 63 Ill. 486." The matter for consideration in the character of the sale. Le Gierse v. Whitehurst, 66 Tex. 244 (1886).

In determining the question whether a vendee had knowledge of the fraudulent intent of his vendor, the jury should take into consideration the acts and declarations of the respective parties, and the facts and circumstances surrounding the sale, and if the knowledge of the vendee is sufficient to put him upon inquiry they may infer knowledge upon his part of such fraudulent intent. Greenwell v. Nash, 13 Neb. 287 (1878).

And the character of the person from whom information comes, and his relation and intimacy with the parties from whom direct information might be expected, and his connection with the particular transaction and facilities for obtaining information, and the degree of knowledge displayed by him, must all be considered upon inquiry as to whether they were sufficient to stimulate inquiry and put a purchaser upon notice; and the information itself must amount to something more than a vague and general statement that the title is defective. Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 26 Ala. 103 (1884).

So, it has been repeatedly held and stated in a general way, that actual notice is not necessary, and expressions are to be found in some of the cases indicating that constructive notice is all that is required.

Thus, knowledge of a purchaser of the intent of his vendor to hinder or delay his creditors, which will invalidate the sale need not be actual, positive information or notice, but may be inferred from knowledge of facts and circumstances sufficient to arouse his suspicion and put him upon inquiry. Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 150 (1869).

To constitute a purchaser a participant in the fraudulent intent of his vendor, it need not be shown that he had direct or positive knowledge of the fraudulent purpose, but it will be sufficient to prove that he had notice of such facts and circumstances as would naturally lead to a strong inference of fraud. New York F. Ins. Co. v. Tooker, 35 N. J. Eq. 408 (1882).

And a purchaser of goods from one who fraudulently obtained possession of them by purchase with intent not to pay for them, with notice of fact sufficient to put a reasonably prudent person on inquiry as to the fraud, will not be protected as against a bona fide purchaser without notice. Actual notice of the fraud is not necessary. Hanchett v. Kinbark, 118 Ill. 121 (1886).

So, it is not necessary that the grantee in a deed made to hinder or delay creditors should have actual knowledge of the debtor's intent to make it void. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him upon inquiry amounts to notice, and is equivalent, in contemplation of law, to actual knowledge, and makes him a party to the wrong. The Holladay Case, 27 Fed. Rep. 830 (1886).

To charge a purchaser with notice of the fraudulent intent of his vendor or to put him upon inquiry, which if omitted is equivalent, the purchaser need not have had at the time of the purchase actual knowledge of the fraudulent intent, or such evidence of it before him as would have been sufficient to establish the fact in a court of justice. Hopkins v. Langton, 30 Wis. 379 (1872).

And the term "notice" as used in Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2465, providing that the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration shall not be affected unless it appears that he had notice of the fraudulent intent of the vendor, is not restricted to actual notice, but the vendee is chargeable with notice of every fact he could have ascertained by proper use of the knowledge he actually possessed. Traylor v. Townsend, 61 Tex. 144 (1884).

And knowledge of a grantee of an indebtedness of his grantor may be inferred from circumstances. Positive proof of such knowledge is not necessary. Zimmerman v. Heinrichs, 43 Iowa, 260 (1876).

So, in Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884), it was held that actual notice is not necessary if the purchaser is chargeable with constructive notice which may be inferred from the knowledge of suggestive facts which if followed up would lead to a discovery of the fraud.

And the rule in Arkansas is, that to avoid a sale it is not required that the purchaser should have actual knowledge of the fraudulent purpose of the vendor; it is sufficient if he had constructive notice. Singer v. Jacobs, 3 McCrary, 638 (1882).

And notice of circumstances sufficient to put a purchaser upon inquiry as to whether the seller intended to defraud his creditors is sufficient to invalidate the sale under the Dakota statute, providing that every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, and who omits to make such inquiry with reasonable diligence, is deemed to have constructive notice of the fact itself. Shauer v. Alterton, 151 U. S. 607, 38 L. ed. 286 (1893).

So, the sufficiency of either actual or constructive notice is recognized in Singer v. Jacobs, supra; Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176 (1884); Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891); Ziegler v. Carter Bros. 94 Ala. 291 (1891); Reeves v. Skipper, 94 Ala. 407 (1891); McKinnon v. Reliance Lumber Co. 63 Tex. 30 (1885); Hutchins v. Chapman, 37 Tex. 612 (1872).

But an exception, perhaps more apparent than real, exists to this rule in several of the states, notably New York, Missouri, and Oregon.

Thus, the proviso of the New York statute relating to fraudulent conveyances, that its provisions shall not be considered in any manner to affect or impair the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration unless it shall appear that such purchaser had previous notice of a fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor or of fraud rendering void the title of such grantor, means that actual notice shall be given of the fraudulent intent, or knowledge of circumstances which are equivalent. Circumstances to put the purchaser on inquiry where full value has been paid are not sufficient. Stearns v. Gage, 79 N. Y. 102 (1879); Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, 85 Hun, 285 (1895).

And the term "previous notice" as used in the proviso of the statute of frauds for the protection of the title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration, unless it shall appear that he had previous notice of a fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor or of the fraud rendering void his title, means actual as distinguished from constructive notice. Farley v. Carpenter, 27 Hun, 359 (1882).

The doctrine of constructive notice does not apply so as to charge a purchaser of land who had that case was, as is also in the case at bar, a question of notice, rather than the question of fraud itself. It was a question of good faith on the part of the transferee, rather than the question as to whether or not the transfer itself was in violation of the rights of creditors, and therefore void. The conclusion reached by the court, that the instruction there given, and designated as "first" of the two which were being considered together, was erroneous, is not, in our judgment, supported either by the authorities upon which the conclusion was based or by the law on the question. In the case of Meixsell v. Williamson the trial court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the mortgage paid a valuable consideration and was in fact innocent of any guilty knowledge, with notice that his grantor made the conveyance with intent to defraud creditors at large. Parker v. Conner, 93 N. Y. 118, 45 Am. Rep. 178 (1883).

In Parker v. Conner, supra, Baker v. Bliss, supra, VII., was distinguished, the court saying that in that case the facts come very nearly if not quite up to actual notice, though the doctrine of constructive fraud is fully discussed.

And the rights of a purchaser are not to be affected by constructive notice of fraud of his vendor, unless it clearly appears that the inquiry suggested by the facts disclosed at the time would, if fairly pursued, result in the discovery of the defect existing but hidden at the time. Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 220 (1864).

So, in Missouri a sale, though made by the vendor with a fraudulent intent, will not be declared void unless the vendee had actual notice and knowledge of such intent. The knowledge had of facts, which, if investigated and followed out, would lead to knowledge of the fraud, is not sufficient, as it is not the duty of every purchaser to inquire into the motives of the vendor in making the sale. State v. Mason, 112 Mo. 374 (1892).

And the fact that a purchaser had such knowledge as would have excited the inquiry of a prudent man with reference to the claim of his vendor, though not sufficient to set aside the transfer, may be considered by the jury in determining the question whether he had actual notice. Sammons v. O'Neill, 60 Mo. App. 530 (1895).

And an instruction in an action to set aside a sale for fraud which predicates fraud upon the intent upon the part of the vendor, and only "good reason to know of such intent," by the vendee, is improper. State v. Mason, 112 Mo. 378 (1892).

So, in Oregon notice to a grantee of the fraudulent intent of his grantor must be actual. Lyons v. Leahy, 15 Or. 8 (1887); Coolidge v. Heneky, 11 Or. 327 (1883).

And in Seavy v. Dearborn, 19 N. H. 351 (1849), it was held that in the absence of circumstances attending a transfer of property from which the law presumes fraud, actual knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the vendor must be charged upon the purchaser in order to avoid such sale in favor of creditors.

Under this doctrine the question to be submitted to the jury where a sale for a valuable consideration is sought to be avoided because the vendee had notice or knowledge of a fraudulent intent of the vendor, is whether he had notice of such fraudulent purpose, and not whether he had knowledge of facts which would put a prudent person upon inquiry and lead to a discovery of fraud. Van Raalte v. Harrington, 101 Mo. 602, 11 L. R. A. 424 (1890); Parker v. Conner, 93 N. Y. 118, 45 Am. Rep. 178 (1883); Coolidge v. Heneky, 11 Or. 327 (1883).

And not whether he was negligent in failing to discover the fraudulent intent. Parker v. Conner, supra.

But even in these states circumstances which should put a purchaser upon inquiry may be used as proof of actual notice, thus rendering the difference between the two rules more apparent than real.

Thus belief on the part of a person receiving property, that his vendor has not a sufficient amount remaining to pay his debts, is equivalent to actual knowledge of the fact for the purpose of testing the validity of the transfer. Pollock v. Van Camp, 74 Hun, 332 (1893).

And the proof of notice on the part of the purchaser of the fraudulent intent of the vendor, when it is necessary to establish it, need not be direct and positive, but such notice may be proved like any other fact in the case, by circumstances and legitimate inferences to be drawn from the whole transaction. Starin v. Kelly, 88 N. Y. 418 (1882); Philbrick v. O'Connor, 15 Or. 15 (1887); Van Raalte v. Harrington, supra.

And is a question of fact for the jury. Van Raalte v. Harrington, supra.

It is a question of fact and may be established by direct evidence or inferred from circumstances or from proof of the vendee's knowledge of facts calculated to awaken suspicion. Lyons v. Leahy, supra.

And knowledge of facts which should put a prudent man upon inquiry is sufficient to warrant an inference of actual notice of the fraudulent intent of the grantor. Ibid.

In Philbrick v. O'Connor, supra, however, the rule laid down in Coolidge v. Heneky, supra, that actual notice is necessary to make a grantee a party to a fraud of his grantor, and that constructive notice is not sufficient, was criticised, the court saying that it could not give its unqualified assent to that doctrine, and that the reason for the distinction between actual and constructive notice was not apparent.

And in that case the court held that a transfer by one against whom an action was pending for damages for shooting a man, of his property to a person in whose family he boarded, for a consideration of one third of its actual value, will warrant holding the deed fraudulent and void where the shooting by the grantor and the pendency of the action were widely known and talked of in the family of the grantee and the grantee was without means or regular employment.

So the degree of inquiry which devolves as a duty upon a person who proposes to make a purchase out of the usual course of the business of the seller depends upon the circumstances of the particular transaction, but reasonable inquiry must be made in all cases as to the right of the seller to make the proposed sale. Schulenburg v. Kabureck, 2 Dill. 132 (1873).

And a purchase from an insolvent debtor of his entire property without any inquiry as to the vendor's financial situation, where the vendee was well acquainted with him and in a position to have some knowledge of his business, is invalid as against the vendor's creditors, where the prosecution of such an inquiry to but a limited extent must have resulted in the acquisition of the knowledge that the sale would be invalid as to his creditors. Ullman v. Crenshaw (Tex.) 16 S. W. 1012 (1891).

So, when the facts and circumstances are such as to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry, that obligation is not satisfied by an inquiry addressed to the chief actor in the suspected fraud who has every motive for concealing the truth, when better and more reliable sources of information are open to him. Singer v. Jacobs, 3 McCrary, 638 (1882).

And a purchaser who is put upon inquiry by no-was not bona fide, but was made to hinder and delay creditors of said Meixsell, then the jury are to find the defendant not guilty. The supreme court held that the objections to this instruction were obvious, that "the intent of P. Meixsell to delay and hinder his creditors is not, under repeated decisions of this court, sufficient. This intent must be mutual. Both the mortgagor and mortgagee must harbor the intent." And in the case of Herkelrath v. Stookey the trial court instructed the jury that, if the mortgage was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, it was void, even though the mortgagee had just claims against the mortgagor; and the court held: "If this instruction had been so framed as to require both the tice of suspicious circumstances cannot rely upon the opinion of an attorney that he will get good title, unless it is based on a knowledge of the facts. Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884).

But a purchaser who made careful inquiry upon receiving notice of sufficient circumstances, and failed to discover any fraud on the part of his vendor, and satisfied himself that the sale was fair, will be protected although the original sale may be subsequently declared fraudulent. Ibid.

And a purchaser will be protected upon making inquiry and becoming reasonably convinced that the sale is fair and honest, though his informant did not know all existing facts tending to show fraud. Ibid.

And conveyances by a husband and wife for a valid consideration of land which had been previously conveyed by the husband to the wife without consideration and in fraud of creditors, cannot be assailed by judgment creditors, transcripts of whose judgments were filed in the county previous to the time of such conveyances but subsequent to the time of the conveyance from the husband to the wife, where the grantees were without actual knowledge of the fraudulent character of the conveyance from the husband to the wife. Sawtelle v. Weymouth (Wash.) 43 Pac. 1101 (1896).

So, the mere fact that a purchaser from a grantee under a conveyance founded upon the consideration of blood and marriage has notice that it is not founded upon a pecuniary consideration, is not sufficient to make it his duty at his peril to inquire whether the title of his grantor was not fraudulent, as he has the right to act upon the legal presumption that the deed was honestly made, unless some fact is brought to his knowledge calculated to raise suspicion in his mind that the conveyance was made with a fraudulent intent. Frazer v. Western, 1 Barb. Ch. 220 (1845).

And a conveyance of land by a husband and wife to the husband's brother-in-law, made with intent to avoid payment of a judgment against the wife for her tort, is good as against such judgment creditor where the brother-in-law took the conveyance at their request because of their inability to pay the taxes, assessments, and encumbrances thereon, although he knew nothing of the property and relied upon their statements as to title, value, and encumbrances. Mathiez v. Day, 36 N. J. Eq. 88 (1882).

b. Notice or knowledge of indebtedness or insolvency.

Fraud is not to be imputed to a purchaser of goods in good faith and for a valuable consideration because the vendor is embarrassed and insolvent. Ballard v. Eckman, 20 Fla. 661 (1884); State, Peirce, v. Merritt, 70 Mo. 276 (1879).

And a transfer may be fraudulent as to creditors though the debtor is not insolvent at the time. Arnold v. Peoples (Tex.) 34 S. W. 755 (1896).

And a conveyance, made with an actual purpose and intent to defraud creditors present and future, is invalid as against them in favor of a grantee participating in the fraudulent intent, without reference to the amount of property possessed by the grantor. Wadsworth v. Williams, 100 Mass. 126 (1868).

So, mere knowledge by a grantee that his grantor was in debt will not defeat the conveyance. Gamble v. Harris, 5 Del. Ch. 512 (1880); Wood v. Elliott (Ky.) 7 S. W. 624 (1888).

And a purchaser of goods on credit cannot be held responsible for a dishonest purpose of his vendor simply because he knows that the vendor owes debts. Lewis v. Rice, 61 Mich. 97 (1886).

And such knowledge, without record of the amount or his ability to pay, will not invalidate the sale, though the purpose of the vendor was to defeat his creditors, where the vendee did not participate in such purpose. Baughman v. Penn, 33 Kan. 504 (1885).

And knowledge by a purchaser that the seller is largely in debt, and that if no one would buy his goods his creditors would get their debts out of them, does not affect the validity of the sale to him where his object in purchasing was not to delay or hinder creditors but only to make a good bargain, or to procure something of which he was in want. Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 150 (1869).

In order to invalidate the purchase it must be shown that he knew of the fraudulent intention, or that the circumstances were such as to put him upon inquiry. Wood v. Elliott (Ky.) 7 S. W. 624 (1888).

But evidence tending to prove that defendant in execution was indebted at the time of a sale by him is not to be excluded because there is no direct evidence that the purchaser had notice of such indebtedness. Stadtler v. Wood, 24 Tex. 622 (1860).

So, the knowledge of a purchaser of the existence of a judgment against his vendor will not affect the validity of a purchase of his personal property, unless he made it with the view to defeat the creditor's execution. Colbert v. Sutton, 5 Del. Ch. 294 (1880); Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446, 5 Am. Dec 348 (1811).

And the mere fact of a sale by a party in failing circumstances, of his property, to a purchaser having knowledge thereof, does not show fraud. Loeschigk v. Bridge, 42 N. Y. 421 (1870).

And knowledge on the part of a purchaser of the suspension or failure of a debtor, or of his being sued, does not necessarily invalidate a sale and deed made by him. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northrup, 22 N. J. Eq. 58 (1871).

So, knowledge by a grantee that his grantor was insolvent does not tend to show knowledge of a purpose of the grantor to defraud creditors which will invalidate the conveyance. Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631 (1889).

And does not put him upon inquiry for a fraudulent intent in making the sale. Mathews v. Reinhardt, 149 Ill. 635 (1894).

And is not sufficient to defeat it as fraudulent as against creditors. Durkee v. Chambers, 57 Mo. 575 (1874); Lowenstein v. Fudickar, 43 La. Ann. 886 (1891).

Even if the object of the vendor was to defraud his creditors, where such purpose was not known to him. Hughes v. Monty, 24 Iowa, 499 (1868).

No presumption arises from the known insolvency of the maker of a deed that the grantee knew of his intent to defraud creditors. Cannon v. Young, 89 N. C. 264 (1883).

The fact that a vendor was insolvent, and his insolvency was known to the purchaser when the property was purchased and the money paid, does not invalidate the sale unless it was made by the vendor with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, and the purchaser either had actual knowledge of such intent or had knowlege of facts from which a reasonably prudent man by proper mortgagor and mortgagees to have participated in the fraudulent intent in order to avoid the mortgage, it would have been unobjectionable. The jury, however, would probably understand such an instruction as referring only to the intent of the mortgagor. A fraudulent intent on his part alone would not vitiate the instrument."

It will be observed that the decision in neither of these cases was upon the question as to whether, if the transfer was fraudulent,—that is, if it was a transfer which the party making the conveyance was prohibited by law from making, or if the conveyance was one which was made in violation of the rights of creditors,—the transferee must have had actual inquiry would have discovered such fraudulent intent. Dittman v. Weiss (Tex.) 31 S. W. 67 (1895).

Thus, a sale for an adequate consideration in cash, made to one not a creditor, with the intention of defrauding the vendor's creditors, will not be set aside as fraudulent where there is nothing to show that the purchaser had any knowledge of the vendor's fraudulent purpose, though he knew that he was notoriously insolvent, and the transaction was not in the usual course of his business. Lowenstein v. Fudickar, supra.

And a purchaser who knew at the time he purchased that his vendor was indebted to some extent, and asked him about it, and was told that he did not owe more than he could pay, making no further inquiry, is not put upon inquiry as to a fraudulent intent upon the part of the vendor where he owned at the time considerable valuable property, subject to execution, and was apparently in good credit. Cox v. Morrison (Tex.) 31 S. W. 85 (1895).

So, a sale upon credit at a fair price to a responsible vendee of the entire effects of an insolvent copartnership is not per se fraudulent as to creditors, though the vendee had knowledge of the insolvency. Ruhl v. Phillips, 48 N. Y. 125, 8 Am. Rep. 522 (1871).

And the purchase by a partner of his copartner's interest in the firm property is not void for fraud because the buyer had knowledge of his partner's insolvency, if he had no reason to suppose that his intention was to defraud creditors by the sale. Darland v. Rosencrans, 56 Iowa, 122 (1881).

And a sale of property, made to a son by a father when embarrassed with debts beyond his ability to pay, is not fraudulent and void as to creditors where the son honestly bought and paid a fair price. McCanless v. Flinchum, 89 N. C. 373 (1883).

And a son who takes a conveyance of all his father's real estate, knowing of his financial embarrassment, giving therefor a mortgage without a bond, and a check for $200, the father surrendering at the same time a note against him for the same sum, can hold the real estate against his father's creditors. First Nat. Bank v. Cummins, 38 N. J. Eq. 191 (1884).

Knowledge of the indebtedness or insolvency of the vendor, however, furnishes evidence of the existence of a fraudulent intent which, taken in connection with other circumstances and conditions, has been frequently held sufficient to put the purchaser upon notice and to invalidate the transfer.

Thus, sales made by an insolvent debtor to one who is not a creditor, having knowledge of the circumstances of his vendor and being in possession of information reasonably calculated to stimulate inquiry, and which if followed up would lead to the disclosure that the purpose of the seller is to put the property beyond the reach of or otherwise to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors, is invalid as against creditors, though full consideration is paid. Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876).

So, as a general rule, a sale on credit to a purchaser, cognizant of the vendor's insolvency, is fraudulent, as the necessary effect is to hinder and defraud creditors. Clark v. Wise, 57 Barb. 416 (1870).

And knowledge upon the part of a purchaser that his vendor was largely in debt for the goods sold, in connection with a purchase on time extending beyond the time when the claims against the vendor became due, may be considered by the jury in connection with other facts in determining whether the conveyance was fraudulent. Hughes v. Monty, 24 Iowa, 499 (1868).

So, the notorious insolvency of a grantor at the time he executed a deed to his son-in-law is a circumstance tending to show that the grantee is a participant in the fraud of the grantor against creditors. Helms v. Green, 105 N. C. 251 (1890).

And a sale by a debtor to his brother-in-law at a time when the debtor was known to be in an embarrassed condition, in which two neighbors were called in to appraise the property and witness the execution of the receipt and conveyance, furnishes sufficient evidence of fraudulent collusion to invalidate the conveyance. Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 28 Am. Rep. 704 (1876).

And a sister who purchases lands from her brother knowing that he is very destitute at the time, who was told by his wife that she had to give up everything and expected that a creditor would go and take their house, cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser. Keyser v. Angle, 40 N. J. Eq. 481 (1885).

So, a conveyance by a mother, engaged in mercantile business, to her son, who was her bookkeeper and knew that she was insolvent, the son giving his note for deferred payment, is fraudulent and void as a withdrawal of the lands from the reach of creditors, which the parties must have been conveying with a view to hindering and delaying them. Blum v. McBride, 69 Tex. 60 (1887).

And the fraudulent intent of a mother in conveying property to her sons will be deemed to have been participated in by them where it consisted of all her real property, and at about the same time she sold them all of her personal property, and they were at the time living with her and had knowledge of her indebtedness and the extent of her property, and after the conveyance the mother lived with them. Chapel v. Clapp, 29 Iowa, 191 (1870).

And a conveyance by a father-in-law to a son-in-law in consideration of a note of a third person then past due, which was transferred by delivery only and had never been collected, made two days before the execution of an assignment from the father-in-law to the son-in-law as trustee, is fraudulent and void as to creditors where the son-in-law had knowledge of the other's insolvency. Cummings v. McCullough, 5 Ala. 324.

So, a conveyance by a debtor of all his property except his homestead and personal property, of trifling value, to his wife and daughter for the purpose of covering the property and protecting it from creditors, will be deemed to have been made to aid his fraudulent purpose, where they must have known his large indebtedness and their explanation of the service from which they received the money was not satisfactory. Leich v. Dee, 86 Iowa, 709 (1891).

And a purchaser from a wife of premises, the purchase money for which had been paid mainly by her husband, taking the conveyance in her name with intent to defraud creditors, is chargeable with notice of such intent where he was a creditor of the husband, his debt having been owed for several years, and he had made ineffectual efforts to secure and collect it, and knew that the husband had paid a portion of the purchase notice of such fraud and such fraudulent intent on the part of the maker of the transfer, or whether or not notice of such facts and circumstances as would put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry would have been sufficient to deprive him of the character of a bona fide purchaser. Manifestly, in order to make a transfer void as against the rights of creditors, there must be something more than simply fraud on the part of the parties m king the transfer. If the transferee has no notice, he is not, under the Illinois decisions, a participant in the fraud, and the conveyance cannot be held void as to him simply because the transfer is fraudulently made by the maker thereof; and an instruction which made the money and was indebted for the remainder, and suit had been brought to collect it, and that the husband owed other debts and demands. Baker v. Bliss, 39 N. Y. 70 (1868).

So, a sale of goods by a debtor in failing circumstances, to be paid for when the purchaser was able, is invalid as against creditors where the purchaser knew of the vendor's financial condition, or knew of such facts as were sufficient to put him upon inquiry, which would have enabled him by reasonable diligence to have ascertained such condition. Jacobs v. Totty, 76 Tex. 343 (1890).

And a creditor taking a transfer of a mortgage made by his debtor is chargeable with knowledge of his debtor's actual condition, where he held three notes against him upon which no interest had been paid for over five years. De Witt v. Van Sickle, 29 N. J. Eq. 209 (1878).

And evidence that one who had assigned his wages was insolvent and in debt to different parties who had on several occasions unsuccessfully attempted to garnish his wages, and that the assignee had notice of such facts, and that he had made such assignments regularly for several successive months to such assignee,—is sufficient, in the absence of anything to show a reason for his selling his time, to justify a finding that the assignment was a device to defraud his creditors, of which the assignee had notice. O'Connor v. Meehan, 47 Minn. 247 (1891).

So, a transfer of a stock of groceries and unsettled accounts by a firm of merchants who were financially embarrassed, of which the purchaser had notice, made in haste, without an inventory, the vendors and their clerks remaining in the store, claiming to be employed by the vendee and continuing to sell goods and collect accounts, will sustain a verdict that the sale was invalid for fraud, where the payment therefor was made by a check upon a bank with which the vendee was connected, which was deposited in the same bank to the credit of the wife of one of the members of the firm and the sister of the other, upon individual indebtedness which they claim to owe her. Golloher v. Martin, 33 Kan. 252 (1885).

And a sale made pursuant to a proposal by the vendor to sell his store and 12 acres of land and assign certain mortgages, saying that he had some debts of honor to pay, and that if he turned out all his personal property he could not pay them, and that he wanted to raise money for the purpose of obtaining a settlement of demands against him,—shows an embarrassed condition of the vendor, and its full disclosure to the purchaser and his willingness to aid in placing the property of the vendor in a situation in which it could not be reached. Blodgett v. Chaplin, 48 Me. 322 (1861).

And the knowledge of a purchaser who had known his vendor for many years that his general reputation for honesty was bad, and that he was not punctual in the payment of his debts, that the value of all his property possessed before he purchased the goods sold, and which could have been used in their purchase, did not exceed one half of their value, and that no change had occurred in his condition since the date of their purchase, and that his pretense that he must sell the entire stock at a great sacrifice to enable himself to pay the counsel defending him in another action was false, and that he was selling the goods for one half their cost in the height of the business season, and in less than ninety days after their purchase and about the time debts contracted in their purchase would be maturing, and that the goods might be disposed of at auction for more than the selling price,—is sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry as to the purpose of the vendor. Singer v. Jacobs, 3 McCrary, 638, 11 Fed. Rep. 559 (1882).

So, transfers taken with knowledge of the vendor's insolvency are void under the bankruptcy and insolvency laws prohibiting transfers by insolvents or in contemplation of insolvency.

Thus, a sale by an insolvent company to a purchaser who knew of its insolvency, of all its furniture and fixtures and of its interest under the lease it held of the premises where its business was carried on, is fraudulent and voidable as against the assignee in bankruptcy of such insolvent company. Brooks v. D'Orville, 7 Ben. 485 (1874).

And a transfer of goods by a trader for the purpose of raising money by selling his goods at an undervalue, not for the purpose of carrying on his business, but in contemplation of stopping payment, and for the purpose of cheating his creditors, to one who has notice, either by express information or from the nature of the transaction, that he is selling his goods for such purpose, is an act of bankruptcy, and the assignee of the trader may recover the goods from the purchaser. Fraser v. Levy, 6 Hurlst. & N. 16 (1860).

But a purchaser from a firm will not be held chargeable with notice of its insolvency so as to defeat a conveyance under the bankruptcy act, where it was known to him that they were doing a good business and had good credit and paid their paper with ordinary promptness, but he did not know the extent of their indebtedness. Rice v. Melendy, 41 Iowa, 395 (1875).

c. Knowledge of intended preference.

The knowledge on the part of a vendee that the debtor sells him his property to pay one creditor in preference to another does not vitiate the sale. Brown v. Smith, 7 B. Mon. 361 (1847).

And knowledge by a purchaser that his vendor intended, after paying certain debts with a part of his property, to apply a part or the whole of the residue to the payment of other just debts, though by way of preferences, will not vitiate the sale. Ellis v. Valentine, 65 Tex. 532 (1886).

Under statutes prohibiting preferences, however, the rule is different, but under such statutes the intent to prefer must have been known to the purchaser.

Thus, a transfer of property in which both vendor and vendee intended to prevent what they considered a sacrifice by sale under execution, and thus enable the vendor afterwards to give a preference to his own proper creditors over those to whom he was liable as surety, is invalid as a fraud upon creditors, hindered or delayed in the collection of their demands. Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 104.

And a sale by vendors who were at the time insolvent, or knew themselves to be on the eve of insolvency, made with intent to defeat or delay their creditors, or to give to one or more a preference, is void unless it was made in the ordinary course of trade to an innocent purchaser. Gottwalls v. Mulholland, 15 U. C. C. P. 62 (1864).

transfer fraudulent simply because of the conduct of the person making the transfer, and which left entirely out of consideration the conduct of the transferee, was manifestly erroneous. The learned chief justice was probably drawn into the error which was committed in holding that the instruction under consideration in the case of Chandler v. Colcord was erroneous by giving too much consideration to the term "participation," as he drew it from the Illinois decisions, and gathering from them that the participation on the part of the transferee which would make the conveyance fraudulent must be some affirmative action on his part in consummating the fraudulent intent of the maker of the instrument. It does

And a sale by an insolvent or embarrassed debtor with intent to give preference among creditors in the use of the proceeds is fraudulent as against creditors, especially where he sells on credit and the purchaser had knowledge or means of acquiring it. Lehman v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 192 (1880).

To make a sale of property by a failing debtor with intent to prefer some creditor invalid under the Delaware statute against fraudulent assignments, the purchaser must have had knowledge of the intention of the seller in so disposing of his property to prefer some of his creditors to others. Groff v. Cooper, 6 Houst. (Del.) 36 (1880).

d. Inadequacy of price.

Proof of inadequacy of price is not alone sufficient to establish a fraudulent intent upon the part of a vendor, participated in by the vendee, which will invalidate the transaction. Jaeger v. Kelley, 52 N. Y. 274 (1873); Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, 85 Hun, 285 (1895); Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571 (1893).

Unless the inadequacy was so manifest as to shock the moral sense and create upon its mere mention a suspicion of fraud. Bierne v. Ray, supra.

A slight inadequacy of consideration is not sufficient to show notice of a fraudulent intent of the grantor upon the part of the grantee. Rusie v. Jameson, 62 Iowa, 52 (1883).

And the purchase of goods for less than their real value is not of itself evidence of fraud or circumvention on the part of the purchaser which will invalidate the sale, where he acted in good faith. Mathews v. Reinhardt, 149 Ill. 635 (1894).

The fact that the price given at a sale was below the actual value of the property does not authorize a conclusive presumption that either the vendor or the vendee was actuated by a fraudulent intent. Montgomery v. Wilson, 31 La. Ann. 196 (1879).

And a purchase from an insolvent vendor, though at an inadequate price, will not be deemed fraudulent unless participation on the part of the purchaser in the design of the vendor to defraud creditors is shown. Trieber v. Andrews, 31 Ark. 163 (1878).

If the consideration of the sale of real estate is valuable and substantial, it will sustain the grantee's title to the premises conveyed, where he is not chargeable with notice of a fraudulent intent on the part of his grantor, though it be inadequate as to amount. Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, supra.

One who claims to hold as a purchaser for value as against a creditor must prove a fair consideration,—not necessarily the full value but a price paid which does not cause surprise or warrant a suspicion of fraud or connivance on his part. Worthy v. Caddell, 76 N. C. 82 (1877).

Thus, that the purchase price of property at a sale was less than it might have sold for on credit does not of itself charge the purchaser with knowledge of the intent of the vendor to defraud his creditors. Douglass v. Douglass (W. Va.) 23 S. E. 671 (1895).

And a purchaser of real estate will not be deprived of his purchase solely because it appears that he believed that he was getting the property for less than he could sell it for. There must be other circumstances having a tendency to make a would-be buyer suspect that the offer to sell at a low price was induced, not by the necessities of the grantor but because of a desire to defraud others. Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, supra.

Even an inadequacy of price so great as to indicate fraud will not invalidate a sale made by one pressed for money and anxious to sell to a purchaser who buys because he regards the property cheap and a good bargain, where he purchases in good faith and did not know that the vendor was insolvent. Zick v. Guebert, 142 Ill. 154 (1892).

And a conveyance will not be set aside as fraudulent upon the ground of inadequacy of price, where the grantee purchased because she thought the property was cheap, and there is nothing to show that the cash value was greater than what she paid. Blish v. Collins, 68 Mich. 542 (1888).

And the fact of a small price is entitled to no weight as a basis of an inference of fraud where the sale was a sheriff's sale open to all bidders. Mead v. Conroe, 113 Pa. 220 (1886).

So, the fact that a merchant sold goods cheaper than other merchants generally in the same place, and that he sold some particular article, whether as a leader or otherwise, at or below cost, is not of itself such a suspicious circumstance that, if known to a purchaser of his goods, ought to have put him upon inquiry, and which if followed up would necessarily or actually lead to knowledge of the vendor's fraudulent intent. Hinds v. Keith, 57 Fed. Rep. 10, 13 U. S. App. 222 (1893).

And a transfer of property exceeding in value the consideration stated in the deed, which consisted of all the grantor's property, reserving benefits to the grantor by a bond for support, furnishes evidence of suspicious circumstances, but neither one nor all of such circumstances taken together is necessarily evidence of fraud on the part of the grantee. Howe Mach. Co. v. Claybourn, 6 Fed. Rep. 438 (1881).

So, in Pochelu v. Catonnet, 40 La. Ann. 327 (1888), it was held that a sale by an insolvent vendor to one not a creditor for a price in cash cannot be annulled at the instance of the vendor's creditors on the charge of similation, though the price was inadequate and the purchaser had knowledge of the vendor's insolvency.

And in First Nat. Bank v. Carter, 89 Ind. 317 (1883), it was held that an arrangement which is duly carried out, by which an insolvent debtor, with intent to defraud his creditors, procured an uncle of his wife to buy his lands worth $12,000 at a sheriff's sale for that sum and pay off the execution amounting to $1,559.92, and giving the land to the debtor's wife, the debtor receipting for the excess of the bid,—vests title in his wife good as against creditors, where the wife had no notice of the fraudulent intent, as she was not a volunteer.

And in Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848), it was held that a purchase of property worth nearly $200,000 for which the purchaser agrees to pay certain debts of the vendor amounting to about $13,000 less than the value of the property, leaving the general creditors of the vendor unpaid and nothing to pay them with, does not of itself show such a fraudulent intent as will require the cancelation of the sale.

But a grossly inadequate consideration in a conveyance by a debtor in failing circumstances is evidence of a fraudulent intent. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883); Hamet v. Dundass, 4 Pa. 178 (1846).

not mean this when used with reference to fraudulent conveyances. It does not mean that the vendee or mortgagee should do any act, in furtherance of the fraudulent design of the maker, other than the taking of the fraudulent conveyance with knowledge or notice, direct or constructive, that the conveyance is a prohibited one, and is made by the person who makes it with the fraudulent intent to hinder or defeat his creditors. The transferee is a participator in the fraud, where that term is used, if he takes the fraudulent conveyance under circumstances where the law will impute to him knowledge of the purpose of the maker

And gives rise to a presumption of fraud therein. Bryan v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 415 (1847).

And notice to a purchaser of goods, of the intention of the seller to defraud his creditors, may be inferred from evidence that the price paid by the purchaser for the goods was less than their real value. Van Raalte v. Harrington, 101 Mo. 602, 11 L. R. A. 424 (1890).

Thus a sale of property for considerably less than the actual value is such evidence of fraud as requires explanation, and may, when coupled with other facts, be controlling proof of the fraudulent intent of the parties. Dodson v. Cooper, 50 Kan. 680 (1893).

And one who purchases an entire stock of goods at a considerable discount, where the effect of the proposed means of payment must be to hinder and delay if not defraud creditors of the seller, takes them at his peril. Beels v. Flynn, 28 Neb. 575 (1890).

And fraud may be inferred from circumstances, —such as the smallness of the consideration expressed as compared with the fair price of the property conveyed, the want of proof of any price having been actually paid, or circumstances attending the delivery and execution of the deed, etc. Hildreth v. Sands, 2 Johns. Ch. 35 (1815).

And the admission by both the vendee and the vendor that the sale was made with intent to defraud, participated in by the vendee, to two witnesses, and proof of the insolvency of the vendor, and that the property conveyed was all he owned, and that the conveyance was made when he was being pressed by his creditors, to his brother, for a grossly inadequate consideration,—is sufficient to warrant a finding that the conveyance was fraudulent and void. Weisiger v. Chisholm, 28 Tex. 780 (1866).

So, a purchase at an inadequate price by a minor son without means, residing with his father, will be held to be invalid where the grantor was generally known to be in failing circumstances and had previously transferred other property to his other children in fraud of creditors. Massie v. Enyart, 32 Ark. 257 (1877).

And where a father, unable to pay his debts, sells his property to his son for less than its reasonable value, the sale is presumed to be fraudulent as to creditors, but the presumption may be rebutted. McCanless v. Flinchum, 89 N. C. 373 (1883).

And the purchase of an estate of a tenant for life who was outlawed and had absconded is fraudulent and void as against creditors, and will be set aside in favor of his creditors where it was made at an undervalue and pending an action at law against the vendor, of which the purchaser had notice. Herne v. Meeres, 1 Vern. 465 (1687).

So, a sale by a merchant in failing circumstances of his entire stock in trade in his store to his brother for a greatly inadequate consideration, accepted by the brother after receiving notice by telegram that the debtor was flat upon his back, and creditors annoying him, consummated by the debtor without awaiting for the arrival of the brother, when no account of the stock was taken at or near that time, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Stirling v. Wagner (Wyo.) 31 Pac. 1032 (1892).

And a transfer made in consideration of a debt previously discharged by a decree in bankruptcy, the amount of which was overstated in the deed and grossly inadequate as compared with the value of the property, the encumbrance also being overstated, made by a debtor to his mother-in-law, who was an inmate of his family, upon the understanding that she would ultimately convey the land to the debtor's wife, which she did, the grantor retaining full control and deriving all the benefit from the property sold, is fraudulent and void as against creditors. Newman v. Kirk, 45 N. J. Eq. 677 (1889).

And where an insolvent debtor, against whom suits were pending, conveyed lands to his brother for an inadequate price, the whole of which did not appear to have been paid, and the conveyance was kept secret for some time, the grantor continuing in possession, making erections and receiving rents and profits, the conveyance will be held to be fraudulent and void as against a subsequent purchaser of the land at a sale under execution against the grantor. Sands v. Hildreth, 14 Johns. 493 (1817).

And evidence of a purchase for an inadequate price for which the purchaser paid in cash though he had a bank account, by one who had never been in the business, and who, when it was first proposed to him, thought the matter a joke, and who made no inquiry as to whether the vendor firm was solvent or insolvent or as to the reason for the proposed sale made upon an appraisal of the property, on Sunday, when no one but the vendee, appraiser, and purchaser were present,—warrants a finding that the sale was fraudulent as to creditors, and should be set aside. Higgins v. Curtis, 44 N. Y. S. R. 194 (1892).

And one who purchased lands at a grossly inadequate price at a sale under execution, procured by the former owner with intent to defraud his creditors, is not a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration within the statute of frauds, though he had no actual knowledge of such fraudulent intent of the former owner. Worthy v. Caddell, 76 N. C. 82 (1877).

The question as to whether the disparity between the real value of the property sold and the consideration paid is such as to justify an inference that the parties entertained a fraudulent intent is one for the jury. Dodson v. Cooper, 50 Kan. 680 (1893); McCanless v. Flinchum, 89 N. C. 373 (1883).

And inadequacy of consideration is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in the determination of the question of good faith on the part of the vendee in making a purchase. Brown v. Texas Cactus Hedge Co. 64 Tex. 396 (1885); Jacobs v. Totty, 76 Tex. 343 (1890); Wilmerding v. Jarmulowsky, 85 Hun, 285 (1895).

Thus, the inadequacy of price in a sale by a failing debtor, of property worth from $3,800 to $4,000 for the sum of $2,000, is sufficient to take the case to the jury on the question of fraud, when coupled with circumstances of secrecy and concealment. Stern Auction & C. Co. v. Mason, 16 Mo. App. 473 (1885).

And a purchase of lands worth at least three times the consideration recited in the deed of conveyance constitutes a strong circumstance tending to show fraud and a secret trust. Bartles v. Gibson, 17 Fed. Rep. 293 (1883).

So, an assignment by an insolvent debtor of a claim of $1,200, which was a first lien upon a farm worth $13,000, for a consideration of $400, is evidence of fraud on the ground of inadequacy of of the conveyance, without his actively taking part in the fraudulent design of the transfer other than the taking of it.

Bump, in his valuable work on Fraudulent Conveyances, on page 200, says: "If the grantee has notice of the debtor's fraudulent intent, the transfer is void without reference to his actual intent. The law in such case charges him with that guilty knowledge which makes him a participator in the fraud." Again, on page 202, he says: "If he has notice of such facts and circumstances, he is considered either to know the fraudulent intent, or purposely omit to make those inquiries which an ordinarily cautious and prudent man in the same situation would make. And in either case he consideration which should be submitted to the jury. Rhoads v. Blatt, 84 Pa. 31 (1877).

And a conveyance of land by a son to his mother, made during the pendency of a notorious litigation against him, for a consideration of at least $2,000 less than its real value, without an examination of the property, will be deemed to have been taken with knowledge of his fraudulent intent, in the absence of any explanation on her part of the badge of fraud against her. Dunn v. Wolf, 81 Iowa, 688 (1891).

But while the fact that the value of property transferred was $2,400 in excess of the consideration stated in the deed which was $4,000, tends to throw suspicion on the good faith of the grantee, taken alone it is not sufficient proof of fraud. Howe Mach. Co. v. Claybourn, 6 Fed. Rep. 438 (1881).

And the payment of $3,000 for $3,164.50 worth of goods is not so materially less than their value as to make the sale fraudulent as to creditors. Fargason v. Hall, 99 Ala. 209 (1893).

So, a purchase of goods for $1,000, and soon after selling them for $800, is not sufficient evidence of fraud to defeat the purchase though it is a circumstance against good faith. Jewett v. Cook, 81 Ill. 260 (1876).

And a purchaser for $1,200 of a stock of goods worth from $1,500 to $2,000, who after a short examination, satisfied himself that it was worth $1,500, is not chargeable with notice of fraud on the part of the seller as matter of law where he made inquiry as to the vendor's debts both of him and of one who suggested the purchase, although he made no inquiry of the clerk in the vendor's store. Jackson v. Glaze, 3 Okla. 143 (1895).

e. Retention of possession.

Fraud may be inferred in a transfer of property, from the grantor continuing in possession or exercising acts of ownership after the transfer. Hildreth v. Sands, 2 Johns. Ch. 35 (1815).

But where the validity of a sale is controverted on the ground of acts of ownership exercised by the vendor after the sale, the question does not depend simply upon his acts but rather upon what he did by permission of the grantee. Talcott v. Wilcox, 9 Conn. 134 (1832); Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1846); King v. Moon, 42 Mo. 551 (1868); Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 613 (1886); Earle v. Thomas, 14 Tex. 583 (1855); Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 415 (1848).

And a sale will be pronounced invalid for want of delivery to the vendee or continued possession by the vendor, not because the title is thereby rendered inchoate, but simply upon the ground that evidence of fraud is thereby furnished. Meade v. Smith, 16 Conn. 346 (1884).

But permitting a debtor to remain in possession of personal property conveyed by him three or four months is not ipso facto or per se evidence of a fraudulent intent. Byrd v. Bradley, 2 B. Mon. 239 (1842).

A vendee who permits his vendor to remain in possession of the property sold need not show that the vendor was not implicated in or guilty of fraud, if he was an innocent purchaser. It is sufficient if he was innocent of and did not participate in the fraud of the vendor, and had no notice thereof. Leque v. Smith (Minn.) 65 N. W. 121 (1895).

And it has been held that the mere fact that a creditor is permitted to remain in possession of land conveyed by him is not enough, when not corroborated by other circumstances, to subject the transaction to the imputation of fraud. Every v. Edgerton, 7 Wend. 259 (1831).

But permitting real estate or personal property to remain in the possession of the vendor after an absolute transfer or conveyance is evidence of fraud. Peck v. Land, 2 Ga. 1, 46 Am. Dec. 368 (1847); Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883).

And is a badge of fraud. Peck v. Land, supra.

And the concurrent possession of personal property by the vendor with the vendee after the sale is prima facie evidence of fraud. Stadtler v. Wood, 24 Tex. 622 (1860); Livesay v. Beard, supra.

And the question of the existence of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the grantee from the vendor's continued possession is one of fact. Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1846).

And is to be considered in connection with other circumstances indicating the existence of a fraudulent intent. King v. Moon, supra.

And the prevailing rule would seem to be that such retention of possession by the vendor is prima facie evidence of fraud.

This was held in Talcott v. Wilcox, 9 Conn. 134 (1832); Perkins v. Patten, 10 Ga. 241 (1851); Edwards v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 613 (1886); Howerton v. Holt, 23 Tex. 52 (1859); Earle v. Thomas, 14 Tex. 583 (1855); Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 415 (1848); Davis v. Turner, 4 Gratt. 422 (1848); Warner v. Norton, 61 U. S. 20 How. 448, 15 L. ed. 950 (1857).

Thus, the burden of proof to establish a purchase in good faith for value rests with the vendee where the sale of the goods is not followed by an actual and continued change of possession, the presumption in such case being that the sale was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the vendor. Snyder v. Dangler, 44 Neb. 600 (1895); Leque v. Smith (Minn.) 65 N. W. 121 (1895).

And any use of the property not consistent with the objects of the deed would increase the force of the presumption. Howerton v. Holt, supra.

But the failure to deliver goods to the vendee at the time of a sale, though evidence of fraud, is prima facie only and may be explained by circumstances. Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446, 5 Am. Dec. 348 (1811).

And it is subject to rebuttal by evidence showing that such possession is consistent, under the circumstances, with fair dealing. Edwards v. Dickson, Bryant v. Kelton, and Davis v. Turner, supra.

Permitting the vendor in an absolute conveyance of personal property to continue in possession thereof after the sale raises a legal presumption that the sale was fraudulent as to the vendor's creditors, which presumption casts the burden of proving the fairness and good faith of the transaction upon the purchaser. Curd v. Miller, 7 Gratt. 185 (1850); Snyder v. Dangler, and Leque v. Smith, supra.

And this can only be done by showing that the sale was fair and for a valuable consideration. Curd v. Miller, supra.

That the presumption may be rebutted by explanation is also recognized in Talcott v. Wilcox, Perkins v. Patten, and Warner v. Norton, supra.

Thus, the retention by the vendor of possession of goods capable of speedy removal for two days is chargeable with participation in the fraud." So the question as to whether or not the transferee must participate in the fraud of the vendor in order to make a conveyance void does not determine the question in controversy. If that term is used to designate the conduct of the vendee or mortgagee which will make the transfer void, it does not determine that the instruction which was given by the lower court in Chandler v. Colcord was erroneous, for he is a participator if he takes it with knowledge of the fraudulent design and purpose of the person making the fraudulent conveyance. We do not think, however, that this is an apt word to use. Its ordinary meaning might be taken to imply the requirement of more activity after the sale thereof, and until they are seized under attachment, continuing under the same business sign, invalidates the sale as to creditors of the vendor. State, Baumunk, v. Goetz (Mo.) 33 S. W. 161 (1895).

And where a vendor of a chattel retains possession after an absolute sale, it is prima facie evidence, which becomes conclusive if unexplained, of a secret trust which is a fraud as to creditors; and that the sale was at first without any trust, but the goods were left with the vendor under a subsequent contract that he should retain possession and pay rent for the use of the goods, is not a satisfactory explanation. Coburn v. Pickering, 3 N. H. 415, 14 Am. Dec. 375 (1826).

And the retention of possession by an insolvent vendor of real estate after the sale, continuing to receive the rents and claiming the property as his own without objection from the vendee, is prima facie evidence that the sale was simulated, although the deed was duly recorded. Hancock v. Horan, 15 Tex. 507 (1855).

And permitting the personal property purchased at a sheriff's or marshal's sale to remain in the possession of the defendant in execution for two years or more is prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud creditors. Stovall v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 8 Smedes & M. 305, 47 Am. Dec. 85 (1847).

So, a sale by a debtor of his land without reservation, with a secret agreement with the purchaser reserving to himself the right to possess and occupy it for a limited time for his own benefit, is fraudulent and void as against creditors. Lukins v. Aird, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 78, 18 L. ed. 750 (1867).

And a transfer by a debtor in failing circumstances of all her property for an inadequate consideration to a single creditor, who knows that other creditors are pressing for payment of their claims, and who allows the debtor and her husband to remain in possession and control of the property, making payment to creditors out of the rents and profits thereof, will be set aside as fraudulent and void as against creditors. Banner v. May, 2 Wash. 221 (1891).

So, the continuance of the vendor in the possession and occupation and full enjoyment of the premises sold, the same after the deed as before, and an absence of interest in the subject manifested by the vendee, together with the fact that the vendor was heavily indebted and suits were pending against him which were maturing to judgment, all of which the vendee knew, considered in connection with evidence with respect to the payment of the consideration stated in the deed, were held sufficient to warrant a finding that it was fraudulent and void as to creditors unless satisfactorily explained in Callan v. Statham, 64 U. S. 23 How. 477 16 L. ed. 532 (1859).

And an assignment providing that the assignor shall remain in possession of the property assigned and continue to sell it and collect the debts, the collection to be applied to replenish the stock, and providing for the renewal of the debts, and that if any of the debts shall not be paid, or if the assignee elect he may take possession of the property and dispose of it, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Means v. Dowd, 128 U. S. 273, 32 L. ed. 429 (1888).

And an assignment by a debtor to trustees for the benefit of creditors, just before several executions were issued against his property, after which he remained with his clerks in possession of the goods, selling them as his own but accounting to the trustees, furnishes sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict in favor of a sheriff in an action of trespass against him for seizing such property as that of the assignor. Armstrong v. Moodie, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 538 (1858).

So, an absolute conveyance by an insolvent debtor, who had been sued in a number of cases, of all his land and personal property to his son, who was a young man without property and a member of his family, for a consideration expressed but not paid or in any manner secured, the grantor remaining in possession,—is conclusive of a fraudulent intent to hinder and delay creditors which will invalidate the transfer. Ringgold v. Waggoner, 14 Ark. 69 (1853).

And a conveyance by a debtor to his brother to avoid paying an anticipated judgment, the bonds taken for which were handed to his son, and the brother, after having held the property about two years, conveyed it to his son, who surrendered the bonds, the property remaining in possession and under the control of the debtor, will be deemed to have been made upon a trust for the use of the debtor, and will be held fraudulent and void both as to existing and subsequent creditors. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587 (1882).

And a sale by a person in embarrassed circumstances, of all his real estate, on the eve of judgments against him, to his son-in-law, who had little means and gave a mortgage for the purchase money, the grantor continuing in partial possession and exercising some control and the son-in-law acting in deference to his directions and actually taking a fraudulent conveyance of the grantor's personal property and removing it out of the county to avoid execution against the grantor, is sufficient, without explanation, to require a finding that the transfer was invalid as against creditors. Jackson, Hooker, v. Mather, 7 Cow. 301 (1827).

And a deed by an insolvent debtor who was being pressed by his creditors, conveying all of his visible property, except that which was exempt and that which was encumbered to its full value, to a young man with small pecuniary means, who was a relative of the grantor and about to marry his daughter, by the terms of which the purchase money was to be paid in instalments through a period of six years,—is fraudulent and void as to creditors, where the grantor remained in possession and a part of the land was conveyed by the grantee within a short time to the grantor's wife upon a fictitious consideration, and the parties united in raising money by mortgages on the land for their common benefit. Thames v. Rembert, 63 Ala. 561 (1879).

But the employment of a debtor by a creditor to whom he has conveyed his stock of goods by a bill of sale, to take charge of and sell the goods, is not fraud per se, but only a badge of fraud to be explained by circumstances. Peters Saddlery & H. Co. v. Schoelkopf, 71 Tex. 418 (1888).

And the presumption of fraud arising from a vendor's continued possession of property sold is discharged and rebutted by proof that the vendor held the property, not as his own, but as agent of the vendee for the latter's convenience or for the purpose of sale on his account. Troy Fertilizer Co. v. Norman (Ala.) 18 So. 201 (1895).

on the part of the transferee than is necessary to be shown, and it does not properly comprehend the great variety of cases in which the conduct on the part of the transferee will make the transfer which is fraudulent on the part of the person making it also fraudulent on the part of the person who takes the transfer. To make a transfer which is fraudulent as to the person making it also fraudulent as to the person taking it, requires nothing more to be shown than simply that the vendee had notice of such facts as would, under the law, prevent his taking it.

Our statutes defining the rights of debtor and creditor, and with reference to the law of notice, actual and constructive, are adopted

So, the fact that after the execution of a bill of sale of a stock of goods, the vendor and all his employees were employed by the purchaser as before, and no sign was put up over the store indicating the change, is not sufficient to show that the transfer was made with intent to hinder, delay, cheat, or defraud creditors, where the vendor testified that the sale was made in good faith. McCreery v. Gordon, 38 Hun, 467 (1886).

And a sale by a debtor to his mother of personal property consisting of cattle and farming utensils, upon an agreement that the purchase money should be applied in payment of debts due from him, which was done, when the mother placed the property purchased upon a farm on which her son was the tenant, after which he used the property as before, furnishes no evidence of a trust between the vendor and the vendee, and is not invalid as calculated to deceive third persons and give the son a delusive credit. Talcott v. Wilcox, 9 Conn. 134 (1832).

So, the fact that a father purchasing all of the property of his son-in-law permits a small portion of it to remain for the use of his daughter does not conclusively establish his participation in a fraudulent intent in making a sale, except, at least, as to the portion remaining. Brown v. Foree, 7 B. Mon. 357, 46 Am. Dec. 519 (1846).

And a purchase by a judgment debtor of prior judgment liens against his debtor's real estate, including a judgment upon which an execution had been issued, and his purchase of such real estate at a sheriff's sale under such execution at a price considerably less than its actual value, after which he permits his debtor to remain in possession, furnishes no ground for an inference of a fraudulent purpose to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of his debtor. Mead v. Conroe, 113 Pa. 220 (1886).

Participation by a purchaser in the fraudulent intent of the seller is only necessary to avoid the transfer under How. (Mich.) Stat. § 6190, making a sale of personal property fraudulent as to creditors where possession is retained by the vendor, unless shown to have been made in good faith, where the sale is followed by an actual change of possession. Kipp v. Lamoreaux, 81 Mich. 299 (1890).

So, the bona fides of a sale of a stock of goods for a consideration of $1,000, by an insolvent vendor to a purchaser engaged in another business and unacquainted with the market value of the goods or the business purchased, who bought at the solicitation of a relative of the vendor, is a question of fact for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that there was a merely colorable, and not an actual, change of possession, and that the vendor was being pressed by other creditors, and that the whole value of the property did not exceed $500. May v. Walter, 56 N. Y. 8 (1874).

And the question as to whether a sale made by an execution debtor the day of the issue of the execution, under which the purchaser took immediate possession, where the collector of internal revenue was the same day called in and made a closing inventory and issued a license to the purchaser, the execution debtor being found in the store at the time of the levy in the capacity of employee, as claimed by the purchaser, was made with intent to defraud creditors,—is one for the jury. Gray v. Trent (Pa.) 16 Atl. 107 (1888).

In Hansen v. Berthelsen, 19 Neb. 433 (1886), however, it was held that a party purchasing property of a grantee thereof under a warranty deed of which the grantor remains in possession must ascertain at his peril by what right such possession is retained.

And in Burgert v. Borchert, 59 Mo. 80 (1875), it was held that a vendee of personal property must take actual possession, which must be open, notorious, and unequivocal and accompanied by the usual indicia of ownership, and there must be a complete change of control over the property to render the transfer good as against creditors.

f. Reservations and secret trusts.

A secret trust or reservation inconsistent with the terms of a conveyance of property is evidence of fraud if not satisfactorily accounted for, but is not conclusive evidence, and is not fraud per se. Oriental Bank v. Haskins, 3 Met. 332, 37 Am. Dec. 140 (1841).

Thus, a secret trust for the benefit of the assignor, accompanying an assignment of property by an insolvent debtor, is an indication of fraud, especially where the debtor transfers all the property he has that is subject to execution. Humphries v. Freeman, 22 Tex. 45 (1858).

And a conveyance by a debtor, absolute upon its face but attended with a secret trust, is fraudulent and void as against a judgment creditor in an action for trespass for acts done after the conveyance. Paul v. Crooker, 8 N. H. 288 (1836).

And an absolute deed duly recorded, which is modified by a separate written defeasance which is not recorded, creates a secret trust in favor of the grantor. Rock Island Nat. Bank v. Western Lumber Co. (Mo.) 34 S. W. 869 (1896).

So, an assignment by a failing and insolvent debtor securing to the assignor an interest in or an unlimited control over the property conveyed, and which has the effect of hindering and delaying creditors, is void as being a fraud upon them. Means v. Dowd, 128 U. S. 273, 32 L. ed. 429 (1888).

And a conveyance made in trust for the grantor, and for the purpose of keeping the property out of the reach of his creditors or to enable him to make a subsequent disposition of it to such of his creditors as he should thereafter prefer or select, is fraudulent and void as against existing creditors. Fullerton v. Viall, 42 How. Pr. 294 (1858).

So, a secret reservation in a conveyance by an insolvent debtor of his land for a valuable and adequate consideration, of the right to use the land without payment of rent for a time, is evidence that the conveyance was made with a fraudulent intent. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883).

And a conveyance of lands by a debtor, made with a secret agreement or understanding that they should be held for his use, after which he takes the oath of insolvency, may be set aside as fraudulent at the suit of a creditor at whose suit he was not in custody. Bullock v. Gordon, 4 Munf. 450 (1815).

And a bill of sale conveying all of a debtor's property, absolute in form, under which the property is delivered, but upon a secret trust to pay certain secured creditors and to reconvey any property which might remain, will support a verdict that the sale was made with intent to hinder, de-from Dakota; and there it was held, in Gress v. Evans, 1 Dak. 386, prior to the time we adopted its statute, that "actual notice of a prior unrecorded conveyance, or of any title, legal or equitable, to the premises, or knowledge and notice of any facts which should put a prudent man upon inquiry, impeaches the good faith of the subsequent purchaser. There should be proof of actual notice of prior title, or prior equities, or circumstances tending to prove such prior rights, which affect the conscience of the subsequent purchaser. Actual notice, of itself, impeaches the subsequent conveyance. Proof of circumstances, short of actual notice, which should put a prudent man upon inquiry, authorizes the court or jury to infer and find lay, and defraud creditors. Corbitt v. Cutcheon, 79 Mich. 41 (1889).

So, a conveyance made with the understanding that the grantee was to hold the property until such a time as the grantor desired, and convey it as he should direct, which was intended to hinder and delay the creditors of the grantor, the grantee knowing of such understanding and that the grantor was indebted at the time, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Allison v. Hagan, 12 Nev. 38 (1877).

And a sale by a tenant to his landlord of all his interest in the farm under the lease, agreeing to manage the farm in the future as the servant of the landlord, which was kept secret, the tenant continuing to live upon the farm and manage the property as before lest his creditors should be alarmed, furnishes conclusive evidence of a secret trust attending the sale, rendering it void as to creditors. Trask v. Bowers, 4 N. H. 309 (1828).

And reserving the possession for one year, free of rent, as a part of the consideration for the sale of the property by a debtor in failing circumstances, constitutes the creation of a secret trust for his own benefit, which will render the conveyance fraudulent and void as to creditors. Lukins v. Aird, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 78, 18 L. ed. 750 (1867).

And a conveyance of land by a debtor upon the understanding that the grantee shall hold it in trust for the grantor, and that as fast as moneys can be realized therefrom they shall be applied by the grantor to the payment of his debts, operates to hinder and delay creditors, and is void as against them, even if made for the purpose of protecting the property from forced sale and possible sacrifice on the process of creditors. Smith v. Conkwright, 28 Minn. 23 (1881).

So, a conveyance of property worth $6,000 for an express consideration of $2,500, accompanied by an agreement to reconvey in a year for the same amount, creates a trust in favor of the grantor, and is fraudulent and void as against the grantor's wife, who is about to prosecute a suit for divorce and alimony. Weber v. Rothchild, 15 Or. 385 (1887).

And a transaction by which an insolvent transferred his property to his business partner by whom it was transferred to the insolvent's brother without consideration in either case, after which the brother negotiated a loan of $600 upon the property which was worth $2,500, giving the $600 to the insolvent, which was claimed to have been used for the payment of some of his debts, is fraudulent and void, and will be set aside as creating a secret trust. Lyons v. Leahy, 15 Or. 8 (1887).

And a conveyance by a debtor to his mother-in-law, who was an inmate of his family, upon the understanding that she would ultimately convey the land to the debtor's wife, which she did, the grantor taking from the grantee a power of attorney by which he retained full control and derived all the benefit from the property, made in consideration of a debt previously discharged by a decree in bankruptcy, the amount of which was overstated in the deed and grossly inadequate as compared with the value of the property, the encumbrances being also overstated therein, is fraudulent and void as against the grantor's creditors. Newman v. Kirk, 45 N. J. Eq. 677 (1889).

And a purchase at a sheriff's sale for the use and benefit of the defendant in the execution in fraud of the rights of creditors is invalid as against creditors where the vendee purchased with a knowledge of such fraud, but would be good if he purchased without notice. Byers v. Fowler, 12 Ark. 218, 54 Am. Dec. 271 (1851).

But a reservation of a benefit to the grantor which is incidental and partial will not invalidate a conveyance made for the actual and real use of the grantee as against the grantor's creditors, unless in fact it was made with the intent to defraud them. Wetherill v. Canney (Minn.) 64 N. W. 818 (1895).

And a conveyance by a father to a son in which a secret benefit is reserved by the grantor to himself will not be set aside as to creditors where the grantee took title without knowledge of such reservation and in the belief that the grantor was not indebted, or had by the transaction provided for the payment of all his debts, and he had no reason to believe otherwise. Howe Mach. Co. v. Claybourn, 6 Fed. Rep. 438 (1881).

And a transfer of a mortgage by a mortgagee for the amount due, to one who sometime afterwards resold the property to the mortgagor, does not tend to prove fraud as against the mortgagees where the transactions were distinct. Pugh v. Harwell (Ala.) 18 So. 535 (1895).

So a sale of cattle and farming utensils after which the vendor becomes the tenant of the vendee, and uses the property in the same manner as he had previously done, is not evidence of a trust between them, and is valid as against creditors. Talcott v. Wilcox, 9 Conn. 134 (1832).

And an agreement between a purchaser at a sheriff's sale and the defendant in the execution that he will convey the property to him upon being reimbursed for all moneys expended is not evidence of fraud. Mead v. Conroe, 113 Pa. 220 (1886).

And the fact that the grantee in a conveyance by an insolvent to his brother, made in consideration of an agreement by the latter to pay debts of the former, kept an account of receipts and expenditures in managing and disposing of the property, crediting himself with the amounts paid to the insolvent before the property was sold, which he submitted to such grantor, and that he paid him rent for the homestead property embraced in the deed, and finally sold the property to the grantor's wife for a nominal consideration, does not necessarily show the reservation of an interest in the property by the grantor. Baker v. Harvey (Mo.) 34 S. W. 853 (1896).

A conveyance by a debtor to his brother to avoid paying an anticipated judgment, however, the bonds taken for which were handed to his son, after which the brother conveyed the property to the son, who surrendered the bonds, the property remaining in the possession and control of the debtor, will be deemed to have been made upon a trust for the use of the debtor, and will be held to be fraudulent and void as to creditors. Johnson v. Wagner, 76 Va. 587 (1882).

So an offer by a creditor who has purchased property from his debtor upon a secret trust for the benefit of the debtor to surrender the property upon payment of his debt, does not make him a bona fide purchaser. Humphries v. Freeman, 22 Tex. 45 (1858).

actual notice. Or, to express it exactly, good faith consists in an honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even through the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all information or belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious. And notice is either actual or constructive. Actual notice consists in express information of a fact. Constructive notice is notice imputed by the law to a person not having actual notice; and every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, and who omits

And taking and recording an absolute conveyance, and giving a separate written defeasance which is withheld from record, do not estop the transferee from attacking a like transaction by the vendor with another as creating a secret trust. Rock Island Nat. Bank v. Western Lumber Co. (Mo.) 34 S. W. 869 (1896).

The good faith of a transaction by which a purchaser of a farm at a sheriff's sale takes possession and afterwards buys from the execution defendant the property on the farm, and then leases the dwelling and the personalty to the wife of such execution debtor, who is his sister, and employs the execution debtor as a hired man on the farm, is a question for the jury. Renninger v. Spatz, 128 Pa. 524 (1889.)

In Lyons v. Leahy, 15 Or. 8 (1887), however, it was held that a conveyance made without consideration or upon some reservation for the benefit of the grantor or some person having no interest in the conveyance, or upon a secret trust, may be set aside without reference to the knowledge or intent of the grantee.

So, in Coburn v. Pickering, 3 N. H. 415, 14 Am. Dec. 375 (1826), it was stated absolutely that a trust in a sale of chattels is a fraud with respect to creditors.

g. Transfers out of the ordinary course of business.

Unusual circumstances outside of the ordinary routine of mercantile business,—such as great haste in consummating a sale, making it at an unusual time, and embracing in it the entire stock in trade of an established house, and an offer by the purchaser to resell at a price greatly below invoice rates,—are sufficient when known to the purchaser, to put him upon inquiry as to the bona fides and validity of the sale. Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884).

And facts of an unusual or suspicious nature having reference to the transaction sought to be impeached, and so related to it that if faithfully pursued and inquired into would discover its true character, are sufficient to charge the purchaser with notice of a fraudulent intent of his vendor. Ibid.

Thus a sale by an insolvent debtor, not made in the usual and ordinary course of business, is sufficient to charge the purchaser with notice of such debtor's insolvency. Ohleyer v. Bunce, 65 Cal. 544 (1884).

And an assignment taken by one who had notice of suspicious, unusual, and extraordinary circumstances which should have put him upon inquiry, is void as to creditors, though he paid a full consideration. Tantum v. Green, 21 N. J. Eq. 364 (1869).

So, transfers made by a bankrupt not in the usual and ordinary course of his business are prima facie evidence that fraud upon the bankruptcy act was intended, and impose upon the purchaser the active duty of inquiring into the debtor's financial situation. Judson v. The Courier Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 541 (1883).

And a purchase of negroes out of the usual course of business when they had been run out of the state by the owner to avoid the payment of his debts, with a knowledge of the fact, paying mostly in cash, constitutes such a participation by the purchaser in the fraudulent design of the seller as will invalidate the transfer. Christian v. Greenwood, 23 Ark. 258, 79 Am. Dec. 104 (1861).

So, a sale by an insolvent merchant of all his stock of property is prima facie evidence of fraud as against the immediate vendee and all actual participators. Babbitt v. Walbrun, 1 Dill. 19 (1870).

And a sale by a retail vendor of liquors of his entire business in bulk is not a transfer in the ordinary course of business, and is therefore prima facie fraudulent and void as to creditors. Chevalier v. Commins, 106 Cal. 580 (1895).

And that the whole of a stock of goods was sold for less than it was worth, out of the usual course of trade, without any inventory having been taken, when the vendor appeared to be doing a prosperous business and had just bought goods to replenish his stock, and the seller required that the purchase money not paid in cash should be secured by notes, not payable to himself but to his brother, living in a distant state, and that they should be payable to bearer instead of to the payee, are sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry as to the fraudulent intent of the vendor in making the sale. Blum v. Simpson, 66 Tex. 84 (1886).

So, secrecy in making a contract of sale is a circumstance from which, connected with other facts, fraud may be inferred. Warner v. Norton, 61 U. S. 20 How. 448, 15 L. ed. 950 (1857).

An unusual degree of secrecy in a sale by an insolvent is evidence of fraud, and the existence of such secrecy is a question of fact for the jury. Fishel v. Lockard, 52 Ga. 632 (1874).

And solicitude of a vendor in failing circumstances to conceal the transaction from one of his creditors, and anxiety on his part to remove the agent of the creditor from the store before any part of the goods were removed, communicated to the purchaser, are sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to the fraudulent intent of the vendor. Stern Auction & C. Co. v. Mason, 16 Mo. App. 473 (1885).

And a sale and disposal of paying investments and valuable property made to two persons, one of whom had been the overseer of the vendor firm for several years, and the other was the father-in-law of one of the partners, who were persons of small means relatively to the value of the things purchased, made upon a sudden proposition and consummated with an unusual celerity and with a confidence as to the precise objects bought existing at the moment of the sale and the value of the same, rarely found in ordinary business transactions, will be set aside as simulated with the cognizance of the purchasers, where the vendors continued to display an active interest in the affairs of the vendees after the sale. American Nat. Bank v. Viterbo, 46 La. Ann. 1313 (1894).

And a sale by an embarrassed debtor for an inadequate price, which was first spoken of on Saturday afternoon and concluded that night before an inventory of the articles sold could be taken, the purchaser paying $500 in cash that night upon a demand of the vendor without assigning a reason, the balance, which was expected to be about $250, being required to be paid after completion of the inventory, to a creditor, will be deemed to have been made with an intent to defraud creditors, participated in by the purchaser, which will invalidate it as against creditors. Adler-Goldman Commission Co. v. Hathcock, 55 Ark. 579 (1892).

So, a conveyance of his whole property by a person upon the eve of a decree being rendered against him for a large sum of money which would go far to make such inquiry with reasonable diligence, is deemed to have constructive notice of the fact itself."

In Young v. Harris, 4 Dak. 367, decided in 1887, the following instruction: "I also instruct you that a transfer of personal property made with intent on the part of the seller to delay and defraud his creditors, and the party to whom the transfer is made has knowledge of the facts and circumstances from which such fraudulent intent might reasonably and naturally be inferred by an ordinarily cautious person, is fraudulent and void against the rights of creditors,"—while it was held to be as liberal to his ruin, to his brother-in-law for a consideration equal to its full value, who, though a thrifty, industrious man, was not known to possess property sufficient to pay the purchase money, and who suffered the estate to remain in the possession of the former tenant, would be so strongly presumed to be fraudulent that it ought not to be supported. Venable v. Bank of United States, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 107, 7 L. ed. 364 (1829).

But a purchase by a pawnbroker of a stock of goods of a trader, made for a good consideration and followed by due change of possession, is good as against creditors, though the purchase was made in a hasty manner and without making any inquiries whether the vendor was indebted or whether he wanted to sell in a hurry. Hale v. Saloon Omnibus Co. 4 Drew. 492, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 777, 7 Week. Rep. 316 (1859).

A sale made by a debtor out of the ordinary course of business, however, is not fraudulent per se, but is a circumstance tending to prove fraud. State, Peirce, v. Merritt, 70 Mo. 276 (1879).

It is only prima facie evidence of fraud, and may be overcome by proof that the grantor acted in good faith without knowledge of the insolvency. Bernheim v. Christal, 76 Cal. 567 (1888); Babbitt v. Walbrun, 1 Dill. 19 (1870).

And in Lowenstein v. Fudickar, 43 La. Ann. 886 (1891), a sale for an adequate consideration in cash, made with intent to defraud the vendor's creditors, was upheld in the absence of anything to show that the purchaser had knowledge of such intent, though he knew that the vendor was notoriously insolvent and the transaction was not in the usual course of his business.

h. Sales on credit.

Sales on credit are frequent in commercial transactions, and as a matter of course when standing alone furnish no evidence of a fraudulent intent. Taken in connection with the insolvency of the vendor, however, the rule is different; and while this does not establish fraud per se, such sales by an insolvent have frequently been treated as furnishing one of the elements of fraud by which the transfer is vitiated.

Thus, the insolvency of the seller of goods, and the fact that credit was given, are not sufficient to show a participation by the purchaser in an intent of the vendor to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors which will vitiate the sale. Lienkauf v. Morris, 66 Ala. 406 (1880).

And an absolute conveyance by an insolvent debtor to an insolvent vendee, who has no knowledge of the vendor's embarrassments and who entertains no fraudulent intent upon a long credit, is not per se void, though it may be evidence of fraud to be considered by the jury. Beasley v. Bray, 98 N. C. 266 (1887).

The mere fact that an insolvent debtor may sell property on credit, even to one who knows of his insolvency, does not necessarily make the transaction fraudulent, as such a sale may be the best possible means of realizing on the property; but in such sales the absolute liability of the buyer should be fixed by the contract of sale leaving him subject to all the remedies creditors have in such cases. Jacobs v. Totty, 76 Tex. 343 (1890).

In Clark v. Wise, 57 Barb. 416 (1870), however, it was said that as a general rule a sale on credit to a purchaser cognizant of the vendor's insolvency is fraudulent, as the necessary effect is to hinder and defraud creditors.

And the custom of a merchant in carrying on a particular business to buy upon credit would ordinarily be sufficient notice to a purchaser of his whole stock that he was more or less in debt at the time of the sale. Le Gierse v. Whitehurst, 66 Tex. 244 (1886).

And a sale of chattels upon an agreement for an unusual extension of credit to the purchaser may be considered by the jury in determining the good faith of the transaction. Spaulding v. Adams, 63 Iowa, 437 (1884).

So, a purchase of goods on time extending beyond the time when claims against the vendor become due, by a purchaser who knew that the vendor was largely in debt for the goods sold, may be considered by the jury in connection with other facts in determining whether the transaction was fraudulent. Hughes v. Monty, 24 Iowa, 499 (1868).

And a sale of goods by a debtor in failing circumstances, to be paid for when the purchaser was able, is invalid as against creditors, where the purchaser knew of the vendor's financial condition, or of such facts as were sufficient to put him upon inquiry which would have enabled him by reasonable diligence to have ascertained such condition. Jacobs v. Totty, supra.

And a conveyance of all his property by a father, greatly in debt and in apprehension of a heavy judgment against him, to his son for a cash payment and deferred payments without interest, running through a period of fifteen years, providing that the son shall maintain the father and his mother during their lives, will be set aside as fraudulent as against creditors in the absence of any explanation consistent with honesty of purpose. Click v. Green, 77 Va. 827 (1883).

And notice to a purchaser of a mortgage of the insolvency of the mortgagor is notice of the corrupt purpose of the arrangement, where the sum secured did not bear interest for a year and part of the amount was not payable until eight years after its date, and the purchaser knew that it was a scheme by which the insolvent debtor had transferred all his tangible property to his son, who was without means, and who up to the time of the execution of the mortgage had lived as a member of his father's family. De Witt v. Van Sickle, 29 N. J. Eq. 209 (1878).

So, a purchase of a stock of goods without taking any inventory, by one unacquainted with the business or with the value of such goods, at 50 per cent of cost price, which was but 50 per cent of the indebtedness against the goods, giving negotiable, unsecured, and noninterest-bearing notes, of equal amounts, due in six, twelve, and eighteen months, is invalid as against creditors where it included all of the debtor's property. Roberts v. Radcliff, 35 Kan. 502 (1886).

And a transfer by a failing debtor to his son and clerk, taking notes without security, payable from three months to three years from date, with a view of placing his property in such a situation that his creditors could not take it under legal process and to compel them to take such notes, is such a hindering and delaying of creditors as will render the transfer void. Downing v. Kelly, 49 Barb. 547 (1867).

And a sale by a merchant of a stock of goods worth about $6,000 when his indebtedness was but little over half that sum, to his son who was with-as the person attacking the conveyance on the ground of fraud could claim the law to be, was yet held to be proper as limiting and qualifying the expression "in good faith" used in another part of the instructions.

In Shauer v. Alterton, 151 U. S. 607, 38 L. ed. 286, the proper construction of the Dakota statute with reference to fraudulent transfers was before the Supreme Court of the United States. Concerning it, Mr. Justice Harlan, after referring to the construction placed upon the law in Dakota, and in holding that the instruction which was given by the trial court, under the Dakota statute, similar to that which was asked for by the plaintiff below, was proper, said: "A less stringent rule cannot be applied out property of value and had been in his employ for some time, at a time when his creditors were pressing, the consideration being promissory notes running from three months to three years, will be held to be fraudulent and void as against creditors, where shortly after the purchase the son went away to school leaving his father in possession under power of attorney. Kurtz v. Miller, 26 Kan. 314 (1881).

And a transfer by an insolvent who was being pressed by creditors, of all his visible property which was not exempt or encumbered to its full value, to a young man of small pecuniary means who was a relative and who was about to marry the grantor's daughter, by the terms of which the purchase money was to be paid in instalments through a period of six years, the grantor remaining in possession and the grantee conveying a part of it to the grantor's wife upon a fictitious consideration a short time afterwards and the parties uniting in raising money on the land for their common benefit,—is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Thames v. Rembert, 63 Ala. 561 (1879).

Knowledge by a purchaser of a stock of goods known to him to have been purchased by the vendor upon credit, that the vendor had plenty of other property to satisfy all the liabilities which the size and character of his business would induce anyone to suppose existed at any one time however, is sufficient to silence the inquiry which he would otherwise have been called upon to make by such knowledge that the goods were purchased upon credit. Le Gierse v. Whitehurst, 66 Tex. 244 (1886).

A purchaser of goods from an insolvent debtor for a fair price is not chargeable with notice of the insolvency of the vendor so as to invalidate the sale, by the fact that in making an inventory of the stock with a view of making the purchase he used invoices which showed that the goods had been bought upon credit, there being nothing to show that the goods were not then paid for. Smith v. Kaufman, 100 Ala. 408 (1893).

1. Purchase pending action.

A valid sale of property during the pendency of an action brought for the purpose of setting aside an alleged fraudulent sale of the same property to the detriment of a complaining creditor cannot be made either by the vendor or his vendee or both. New Orleans v. Marchand, 35 La. Ann. 222 (1883).

Persons claiming land, not parties to a suit, with a title derived pendente lite, are in no better condition than those under whom they claim. Schaferman v. O'Brien, 28 Md. 565, 92 Am. Dec. 708 (1868).

And a purchaser pendente lite from one holding an alleged fraudulent conveyance acquires no title as against the claim in suit. Copenheaver v. Huffaker, 6 B. Mon. 18 (1845).

And a purchase by the wife of a mortgagor at a sale by the trustee under the mortgage, paying the purchase price with her own money during the pendency of the proceeding in which she was a party to set aside the mortgage upon the ground of fraud, does not make her an innocent purchaser, and she cannot hold as against creditors. Henry v. Harrell, 57 Ark. 569 (1893).

So, an assignment of choses in action, made by an execution debtor after proceeding for discovery, to an assignee having notice of such proceeding, is void as against a receiver subsequently appointed. Coleman v. Roff, 45 N. J. L. 7 (1883).

And one who purchases lands after a suit to foreclose a vendor's lien thereon has been pending for over five years is chargeable with constructive notice thereof, and is not entitled to protection against creditors. Hutchins v. Chapman, 37 Tex. 612 (1872).

And actual notice to a purchaser from a husband, that his wife has sued for a divorce and that she claims the property purchased, brings a case within the provisions of Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 47, art. 3, § 12, providing that sales and conveyances made by a husband to a purchaser with notice and with intent to defraud and hinder the wife shall be void as against her. Williams v. Gooch, 3 Met. (Ky.) 486 (1861).

So, a purchaser of a fraudulent grantee with knowledge of a suit against the original vendor and of the relation between him and his immediate vendor, and of the fact that his vendor's deed was recorded just before judgment was entered in such action, is not an innocent purchaser, the facts being sufficient to put him upon inquiry. Hamlin v. Wright, 26 Wis. 50 (1870).

And a purchase of an estate of a tenant for life who was outlawed and had absconded, made at an undervalue pending an action at law against the vendor of which the purchaser had notice, is fraudulent and void as against creditors. Herne v. Meeres, 1 Vern. 465 (1687).

And a purchaser in good faith from a fraudulent grantee will not be protected as to purchase moneys paid by him after service of summons upon him in an action by a judgment creditor of his vendor's grantor to have the several sales adjudged fraudulent and his judgment declared a lien on the land. Hamlin v. Wright, supra.

The knowledge of a vendee at the time of his purchase, that a suit was pending against his vendor to recover judgment for a debt, however, is not of itself proof of a fraudulent intent on his part. Stewart v. English, 6 Ind. 176 (1855); Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Northrup, 22 N. J. Eq. 58 (1871).

And the pendency of an action brought by a creditor against a mortgagor and a mortgagee to recover damages for conspiracy is not notice to a purchaser in good faith at a sale made under a chattel mortgage, of any infirmity in it, at least where the complaint has not been filed. Zoeller v. Riley, 100 N. Y. 102, 53 Am. Rep. 157 (1885).

So, in Peaslee v. Collier, 83 Mich. 549 (1890), a conveyance of a mortgaged homestead and other land by a husband to his wife in consideration of the release of her dower in other real estate owned by him and which he desired to dispose of, and of $200 claimed to be due her for improvements upon the homestead, was upheld where the only evidence tending to show fraud consisted of the fact that the deed was made during the pendency of a creditor's suit and when he was about to procure judgment.

But the pendency of suits against an indebted vendor at the time that a purchaser buys lands of him is a badge of fraud and a fact for the consideration of the jury in determining whether the purchaser bought with notice under the statute of Elizabeth. Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258 (1850).

And a sale of his property made by a defendant in execution pending litigation to prevent those to the Dakota statute relating to transfers of property with intent to delay or defraud creditors. The plaintiff had the right, by a purchase of his brother's stock of merchandise, to obtain payment of his claims in preference to the claims of other creditors. But the statute of Dakota, however liberally construed in favor of purchasers from a fraudulent debtor, will not permit him to enjoy, to the exclusion of other creditors, the fruits of his purchase, when the sale was made with the intent to delay or defraud other creditors, if he had, at the time, actual notice of such intent or knowledge of such circumstances or facts as were sufficient to put a prudent person upon an inquiry that would have disclosed the existence of such intent upon suing him from making their claims, to a purchaser who had reasonable grounds to suspect that such was his object, is invalid as against the person suing him. Smith v. Wellborn, 75 Ga. 799 (1885).

And one who has a cause of action for the seduction of his wife is, in legal contemplation, a creditor of the wrongdoer, and in a suit to enforce a judgment obtained for such wrong, against real estate fraudulently conveyed, it is competent to introduce declarations of the grantee made before the deed was executed to him, showing his knowledge that such a right of action existed. Hunsinger v. Hofer, 110 Ind. 390 (1887).

And a conveyance by a debtor of all his attachable property while a reference is pending between the debtor and a creditor, when there was reason to presume that an award had been made against him, the debtor being permitted to use and deal with the property after the conveyance the same as before, of which he sold a large portion, the vendee making no effort to obtain the proceeds or to interfere with the management and disposition, in connection with declarations by both vendor and vendee that the vendor's determination was to avoid the payment of a designated creditor,—is sufficient to warrant the inference that the conveyance was taken simply to prevent such creditor from securing his demand. Hartshorn v. Eames, 31 Me. 93 (1849).

As to commencement of suit as notice to charge purchaser who has not paid all the purchase money, see infra, VIII., Payment after notice.

j. Purchase pending attachment or execution.

A conveyance at a time when the writ of attachment against the property of the grantor was in the hands of the sheriff, of the issuing of which the grantee had no knowledge and which was never levied, is not rendered fraudulent by such attachment proceeding. Lowry v. Howard, 35 Ind. 170, 9 Am. Rep. 676 (1871).

And an innocent purchaser for value from a fraudulent grantee who purchased subsequent to an attachment of all the original grantor's interest in real estate, which such original grantor had conveyed to the fraudulent grantee by deed recorded before the attachment, is not put upon notice and inquiry as to such previous transaction. Ashland Sav. Bank v. Mead, 63 N. H. 435 (1885).

But a purchase of property under circumstances which must have suggested to the purchaser that the object of the vendor was to dispose of his property for value before it could be attached or seized under a judgment recently obtained is invalid as against the judgment debtor, though he had no actual notice of such intent. Green v. Tantum, 19 N. J. Eq. 105 (1868).

And a bill of sale or deed is invalid as a fraud upon creditors when taken at a time when attachment had been levied on the vendor's stock and his career as a merchant was practically closed, and the vendee knew that there were other creditors, and the consideration consisted of legal services, most of which was earned in the litigation accruing out of the transaction. Liddle v. Allen, 90 Iowa, 738 (1894.)

And the negotiation by a debtor of a sale of all his property, in haste and at an unseasonable hour, after the refusal of another to purchase the goods, because he was expected to pay the purchase money to the debtor instead of to creditors, to whom the purchaser had offered to loan money to consummate the purchase, having knowledge that an attachment was about to issue, and urged the completion of the inventory as soon as possible, shows an active participation by the purchaser in the fraudulent intent of the vendor which will invalidate the conveyance. Carter Bros. v. Coleman, 82 Ala. 177 (1886).

And a sale by a fraudulent purchaser who had taken the property from a previous fraudulent vendor who intended to hinder and defraud his creditors, made to an employee who knew that an attachment was about to be levied thereon as the property of the fraudulent vendor, taking his notes therefor, does not make such employee a bona fide purchaser. Lane v. Starkey, 15 Neb. 285 (1883).

So, a bona fide sale of goods for a valuable consideration is not invalidated by knowledge that an execution is about to be issued against the property sold. Hale v. Saloon Omnibus Co. 4 Drew. 492, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 777, 7 Week. Rep. 316 (1859).

And the mere knowledge of a purchaser of the fact that the sheriff was seeking to subject the property purchased to the satisfaction of execution in his hands would not of itself invalidate the purchase. Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887).

But if he purchased with a view to defeat the remedy of creditors in relation to the goods purchased, it would be invalid, though he gave a fair price. Ibid.

So, the levy of an execution issued upon a judgment against a third person rendered subsequent to a purchase by one holding under an executory contract is not such constructive notice to the purchaser of fraud on the part of the vendor as will render the sale invalid. Studabaker v. Langard, 79 Ind. 320 (1881).

And a sale by judgment debtors, with the consent of the judgment creditors, of property levied upon under execution, issued on confessed judgments, is not fraudulent and void as to other creditors in the absence of anything to impeach the judgments or the good faith of the purchaser who took the property. McEvony v. McCann, 31 Neb. 597 (1891).

One who purchases lands after allowing himself to be turned out of possession thereof on an execution against his father, which were worth more than $6,000, for $750, knowing that his father had been contesting the title for years, however, must be deemed to have been put upon inquiry and cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice. Pitney v. Leonard, 1 Paige, 461 (1829).

As to levy of attachment or execution as notice to charge purchaser who has not paid all the purchase money, see infra, VIII., Payment after notice.

k. Conveyance fraudulent on its face.

Where a conveyance is fraudulent on its face, both parties will be deemed to have been cognizant of and participated in the fraud. Doe, Lassiter, v. Davis, 64 N. C. 498 (1870).

And a purchaser under a conveyance, containing upon its face evidence of a fraudulent purpose to defeat creditors, takes with notice of such purpose. Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207 (1887); Palmer v. Giles, 5 Jones, Eq. 75 (1859).

the part of the vendor. The plaintiff could not properly have claimed a more favorable interpretation of the Dakota statute than was given to it by the court below. A statute that declares every transfer of property, made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor of his demands, void against all creditors of the debtor, would be wholly defeated in its operation if the rights of the transferee were not subject to the rule that 'whatever is notice enough to excite attention and put the party on his guard, and call for inquiry, is notice of everything to which such inquiry might have led.' Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, 141, 25 L. ed. 807, 809; Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & K. 699, 720." The case of Shauer v. Alter-

The title of a purchaser in good faith from an assignee for the benefit of creditors, however, is not affected, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 137, § 5, providing that the title of the purchaser shall not be affected unless it should appear that he had previous notice, by the fact that the fraudulent character of the assignment appeared upon its face, as the previous notice provided for refers to actual and not constructive notice. Wilson v. Marion, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1066 (1893).

l. Knowledge of or notice to agent.

The rule that notice to an agent or attorney is notice to his principal applies to notice to the attorney for a grantee of the insolvency or fraudulent intent of his grantor. Wiley v. Knight, 27 Ala. 326 (1855).

And notice to a husband who acted as agent of his wife in making a purchase, of the fraudulent intent of the vendor, is equivalent to a notice to the wife. Hart v. Sandv. 39 W. Va. 644 (1894).

So a purchaser at a public sale of lands, designed and carried out for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the owner, cannot hold such lands as against such creditors, where the person representing him in the transaction had knowledge of such fraudulent intent, though he was not personally present and was ignorant as to the facts. Lund v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. 31 N. J. Eq. 355 (1879).

And the knowledge of an attorney in whose hands a claim was placed for collection, that the debtor had given a mortgage for a large debt covering all his other property, and that there were other demands existing against him, some of which were in his hands and upon which he had vainly endeavored to obtain collateral security, is sufficient to put him upon notice as to the debtor's insolvency so as to invalidate a transfer made by him to his client, though he did not know positively that he was in failing circumstances. Wiley v. Knight, supra.

And a bill of sale prepared by a solicitor who acted for both parties to it and for himself, and who had previously ascertained that the person giving the bill of sale was considered by a sheriff's officer to be a swindler and a disreputable character, is fraudulent, and will be set aside upon the ground that the person taking the bill of sale had notice of all the circumstances, the knowledge of his agent being regarded as his own. Sykes v. Bond, 7 Jur. N. S. 1024 (1861).

But, as in cases of agency in general, the knowledge or notice must have been acquired or received by the agent while he was acting in that particular employment.

Thus, where one in the course of his business as agent, attorney, or counselor for another, obtains knowledge of facts from which a trust would arise, and afterwards becomes the agent, attorney, or counselor of a subsequent purchaser of the property to which the trust attached, in an independent and unconnected transaction, his knowledge is not notice to the person for whom he acts under the second employment. Hood v. Fahnestock, 8 Watts, 489, 34 Am. Dec. 489 (1839).

And knowledge of a note broker of the fraudulent character of notes and a deed of trust sold by him does not affect the purchaser with notice, where he bought on the faith of the record title. Fury v. Kempin, 79 Mo. 477, 9 Mo. App. 30 (1880).

And the knowledge of one who acts as agent both for the firm of which he is a member and a corporation of which he is president, in a sale by the firm to the corporation, of the insolvency of the firm, will not be imputed to the corporation so as to render the transfer invalid as to creditors, where he is faithful to the interests of the corporation and his action is favorable to it. Seixas v. Citizens' Bank, 38 La. Ann. 424 (1886).

So, a sale made by an agent in contemplation of his principal's bankruptcy, for the purpose of raising money for such principal and another, is not an act of bankruptcy on the part of the principal where the purchaser did not know the sale to be fraudulent. Harwood v. Bartlett, 6 Bing. N. C. 61, 8 Scott, 171, 4 Jur. 73 (1839).

And a wife to whom a deed is made by a third person by the permission of her husband, who participated with the grantor in his intent to defraud other creditors, is not chargeable with complicity in her husband's intent where she purchased without any participation in or actual knowledge thereof, and the evidence does not show that he was her agent. Bruen v. Dunn, 87 Iowa, 483 (1893).

m. Other circumstances and conditions.

The following are cases tending to show what participation by a purchaser in the fraudulent intent of his vendor will invalidate the transfer, which do not fall within any of the above subjects, and do not appear to be readily susceptible of any logical classification.

The failure of a wife to sign a deed of conveyance is not sufficient to charge the grantees of her husband with notice that he made the conveyance to prevent her from recovering alimony in any suit she might commence therefor. Demarest v. House, 91 Hun, 290 (1895).

And a false statement of a consideration in a deed, made with a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, is not alone sufficient proof of the grantee's participation in such fraudulent intent, and is not enough to deprive the latter of her right to reimbursement out of the premises for actual payments to the grantor. Levi v. Welsh, 45 N. J. Eq. 867 (1889).

But a deed which was not delivered to the grantee in any other way than by the grantor's putting it on record raises a well-founded suspicion as to the bona fides of the transaction as to creditors, where the grantee some months after the date of the deed and when the title appeared therefrom to be in him, was present and participated in a negotiation for a loan of money to his grantor which was to be secured by a deed of the same land. Hudgins v. Kemp, 61 U. S. 20 How. 45, 15 L. ed. 853 (1857).

So, the fact that previous to a conveyance by a husband to his wife credit was given to the husband, and the creditor was not informed of the conveyance when a subsequent credit was given, is not evidence of fraudulent intent. Truesdell v. Sarles, 104 N. Y. 164 (1887).

And the fact that a purchaser of goods failed in business three months after his purchase is not of itself sufficient to uphold a finding of fraud in which he had participated. McCreery v. Gordon, 38 Hun, 467 (1886).

And entries in the books of a partnership of which a purchaser was a member, tending to show ton was an appeal from a decision of the supreme court of the territory of Dakota, rendered also before we adopted the Dakota statute, and these citations and excerpts from decided cases will certainly be amply sufficient to show what the law is, and was, in the jurisdiction from which we have borrowed our statute, and what the law is, by adoption, here; and the rule, which we think the proper one, not only has the law itself ingrafted into the jurisprudence of this territory to support it, but is amply supported by the decisions of the highest courts in the states.

In Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89, the trial court had given the following instruction: "(9) Fraudulent intent cannot be inferred by the his participation in the fraud of the vendor in making a sale, will not invalidate it as against creditors, in the absence of other evidence, where he denies the circumstances tending to implicate him. Williamson v. Williams, 11 Lea, 355 (1883).

So, that there was a piece of paper pasted on the back of one of several bonds and also of one of the coupons, and on being held up to the light the paper where some of the numbers of the coupons were appeared to be thin and worn, would not tend to excite suspicion or notice of a prudent purchaser as to the question of the seller's title. Birdsall v. Russell, 29 N. Y. 220 (1864).

And the return of a half dozen hogs by a purchaser of a stock of goods from an embarrassed and insolvent debtor, which were at first included in the sale but afterwards struck out by agreement, and the deduction of the agreed price from the purchase money to be paid, do not as a matter of law show a participation in the fraud of the grantor which will invalidate the sale, but are a matter for consideration of the jury in connection with the evidence explaining it. Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891).

And an exchange of property by a debtor about to make an asignment for the benefit of his creditors with another, effected through a third person who acted as the friend and adviser of each, both of the parties having great confidence in his judgment and candor, not made secretly or hastily but after full negotiation and consideration, the deed being placed upon record as soon as it was made, will not be deemed fraudulent as against creditors of the debtor about to assign. Pillsbury v. Kingon, 36 N. J. Eq. 413 (1883).

But a corporation fraudulently organized by three persons for their own use and benefit, and to which they fraudulently transferred their property for the purpose of defrauding their creditors, such persons owning and controlling all the stock, cannot be regarded as an innocent purchaser who will be protected as against creditors. Clark v. Walter T. Bradley Coal, L. & C. Co. 23 Wash. L. Rep. 419 (1895).

And a conveyance by a merchant of all his stock to his brother who had acted as his clerk, followed by an offer by the purchaser to compromise with the creditors at 20 cents on the dollar, after which they retired to an adjoining county and the purchaser started up business for himself, employing the vendor as his clerk, will be regarded as a sham sale and a scheme to avoid the payment of the vendor's debts, where at about the same time he had sworn that he was worth $2,600 over and above his debts, liabilities, and exemptions. Catchings v. Harcrow, 49 Ark. 20 (1886).

And evidence of a transfer of notes given by a purchaser to a vendor, who had sold for the purpose of avoiding the payment of his debts to the purchaser's father-in-law and general adviser throughout the transaction, at a discount of 22 per cent, though the notes drew 10 per cent interest, made in the face of the statement of the vendor to both the purchaser and his father-in-law, that the notes were intended for his brother's benefit, and the return of the notes to the vendor a day or two before a writ of garnishment was served upon the father-in-law, after which the notes were purchased by the father-in-law's brother and placed in the father-in-law's hands for collection, who collected them,— strongly indicates, if it does not establish the fact, that the purchaser knew that it was the intention of the vendor in making the sale to avoid the payment of his creditors. Blum v. Simpson, 71 Tex. 628 (1888).

So, evidence that a debtor, who was being pressed for payment of claims against him, conveyed real estate to his son for an express consideration of $10,000, the son giving back the mortgage to his mother and borrowing $10,000 of his father-in-law, which he paid to his father, who paid it to his wife, professedly in payment of an old claim, and she gave it to her son, who returned it to his father-in-law, the father in the mean time having disposed of his other property,—is sufficient to show that the deed and mortgage were a part of a scheme to hinder, delay, and defeat the creditors of the father, and were therefore fraudulent and void. Nichols v. Morrow, 34 N. Y. S. R. 495 (1890).

And a transfer of western lands by a debtor to his brother, who was a man of small means residing in Boston, and having no money in the bank, and who never dealt in western lands and had no knowledge or notion of the value or the use of the lands purchased, and who had never seen the lands and had never been in the lumber business and took no means to ascertain their value and character and could not tell how he came by the $15,000 in cash which he claimed to have paid for them, and which he left in the care of his brother on the claim that he had enough to do and did not want to care for them,—furnishes sufficient evidence of a fraudulent purpose to warrant the cancelation of the sale. Bartles v. Gibson, 17 Fed. Rep. 293 (1883).

And recovery deeds made by a tenant for life and his son, who was tenant in tail male in remainder, purporting to assure the entailed property to the use of a trustee in trust to pay a certain mortgage with remainder to the use of the son and father upon designated trusts, with remainder to the father in fee, which were executed by the father with intent to defraud his creditors, which object was concealed from the son, after which the father became a bankrupt, are void as against creditors, and a grandson has no equity as against a purchaser from the son to have the trust in the deed performed. Tarleton v. Liddell, 4 De G. & S. 538 (1851).

VIII. Payment after notice.

To constitute one a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration he must be without notice of the rights and equities with which it is sought to charge him, not only at the time of the purchase but also at the time of the actual payment of the consideration. Marsh v. Armstrong, 20 Minn. 81, 18 Am. Rep. 355 (1873); McNichols v. Richter, 13 Mo. App. 515 (1883); Paul v. Fulton, 25 Mo. 156 (1857); Savage v. Hazard, 11 Neb. 323 (1881); Hutchins v. Chapman, 37 Tex. 612 (1872); Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Zeigler, 58 Ala. 221 (1877).

A purchaser who pays the purchase money after notice of the fraudulent purpose of his grantor is not entitled to protection against creditors of his grantor as a bona fide purchaser. Hunsinger v. Hofer, 110 Ind. 390 (1887).

And no one but a purchaser for a valuable consideration actually passed before notice of fraud can claim title to property which has been fraudujury without proof, but it must be proved like any other act to the satisfaction of the jury; and unless such fraudulent intent is proved on the part of both Pier & Wagley and Hough & Wagley by a preponderance of evidence, the verdict of the jury should be for the plaintiffs." Concerning this, the court said: "The charge as given in the [illegible]th request is not in accordance with the rule as laid down by the courts upon that subject. A fraudulent intent on the part of Pier & Wagley, and notice or knowledge of such intent on the part of Hough & Wagley, are sufficient to avoid the sale, without any proof whatever of actual fraudulent intent on the part of these latter parties. It is generally held that knowl-lently disposed of by an insolvent or failing merchant. Bush v. Collins, 35 Kan. 535 (1886); Hedrick v. Strauss, 42 Neb. 485 (1894).

And payments made after such notice are made at his own risk, and may be recovered by creditors. Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Ziegler, supra.

So, one claiming to be an innocent purchaser without notice of the fraud of his vendor must show want of notice until after the actual payment of the purchase money. Duncan v. Johnson, 13 Ark. 190 (1852); Weber v. Rothchild, 15 Or. 385 (1887).

And the title of a purchaser will not be protected where he obtained knowledge of the vendor's fraudulent intent, or of circumstances sufficient to put him upon inquiry before payment of the purchase price. Massie v. Enyart, 32 Ark. 257 (1877); Hunsinger v. Hofer, supra; Parkinson v. Hanna, 7 Blackf. 400 (1845).

Thus, where the consideration money specified in a conveyance of real estate made by an insolvent was not paid at the time of the conveyance, it is the duty of the grantee, in ejectment by one claiming as purchaser at a subsequent sheriff's sale, to show that such consideration was afterwards paid, that it was a full price for the property, and that the purchase was not made with an intent to hinder and defraud creditors. Kaine v. Weigley, 22 Pa. 179 (1853).

And one who purchased a chattel mortgage from a brother of the mortgagor, making no actual payment thereon until he had been informed by the creditors of the mortgagor that the mortgage was invalid, is not entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser, where he knew that the mortgagor was insolvent when he executed the mortgage. Burnham v. Dillon, 100 Mich. 352 (1894).

And a sale of land made for the purpose of defeating the recovery of damages for a breach of promise of marriage is fraudulent and void where the purchaser had notice of the fraudulent intent, though the agreement for the sale was made before suit brought for the breach of promise, and though the purchaser paid an adequate consideration and went into immediate possession, and the whole of the purchase money was in fact applied to the payment of the vendor's bona fide debts. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. L. 324, 23 Am. Dec. 140 (1831).

So, if a purchaser before full payment becomes chargeable with knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the seller, he is required to withhold the unpaid balance to meet the claims of creditors. Crawford v. Kirksey, 55 Ala. 282, 27 Am. Rep. 704 (1876).

And a conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors, to an innocent purchaser who receives notice of the fraud while owing the purchase money or part thereof, will be set aside at the instance of the creditor to the extent of the unpaid purchase money. Rhodes v. Green, 36 Ind. 7 (1871); Perkins v. Swank, 43 Miss. 349 (1871).

And the creditors are not limited to proceeds supplemental to execution. Rhodes v. Green, supra.

A purchaser from an insolvent merchant who sells his stock for the purpose of defrauding his creditors is protected only to the extent of payment made or security or property appropriated in payment thereof before he obtains knowledge of the fraud of his vendor. Work v. Coverdale, 47 Kan. 307 (1891); Bush v. Collins, 35 Kan. 535 (1886); Hedrick v. Strauss, 42 Neb. 485 (1894).

And where lands are purchased from a debtor, and the purchaser pays a part of the purchase money before getting a deed, and learns before paying the balance of the purchase money, that the purchase money was not paid by the debtor for his purchase, and that he is insolvent, and that suits are pending against him, such facts may be submitted to the jury as evidence that he purchased with notice of the fraud. Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258 (1850.)

And one who purchases a stock of goods from an insolvent debtor, who sells for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, with no actual or constructive notice of such intent, and executes a bond to convey certain real estate as part of the purchase price, but subsequently, and before the execution of the conveyance, receives actual notice of such fraudulent intent, is not entitled to reimbursment as against attaching creditors for the real estate actually conveyed after such notice. Dodson v. Cooper, 37 Kan. 346 (1887).

It is not sufficient that the purchaser may have secured the payment of the purchase money. Weber v. Rothchild, 15 Or. 385 (1887).

But it would appear to be sufficient if he had given his negotiable promissory note therefor.

Thus a grantee, in order to hold lands as a bona fide purchaser for value, must show that the consideration has been actually paid, or that he had given a negotiable note therefor before receiving notice of the fraudulent intent of his grantor. Tillman v. Heller, 78 Tex. 597, 11 L. R. A. 628 (1890).

And a grantee in a deed made with intent upon the part of the grantor to defraud his creditors can only be protected to the extent of the money actually paid at the time he received notice of such fraudulent intent, unless notes given by him for such purchase moneys were negotiable. Ibid.

So, that property purchased by an innocent purchaser was attached in his hands before it was paid for, and before the notes given for the price had passed to innocent holders, does not affect him with notice of the fraud of the vendor. Nicol v. Crittenden, 55 Ga. 497 (1875).

And a purchaser at a sale made with the intent upon the part of the vendor to defraud his creditors, who is himself innocent, is not affected upon afterwards discovering such fraudulent intent, though he had not paid the purchase money and the notes given therefor had not passed beyond the control of himself and the seller, where it does not appear that he alone could control them. Ibid.

But a purchaser who gives his check for the purchase money with the understanding that it was not to be paid immediately, instructing his banker to withhold payment until further orders, who, after notice that the creditors of the vendor had attached the property, alleging fraud in the transfer, ordered the check paid, is not entitled to be considered a bona fide purchaser. Arnholt v. Hartwig, 73 Mo. 485 (1881).

And where a debtor made an assignment of his property, which was void on its face as against creditors, and a purchaser of the property of the assignee verbally agreed to pay for it at certain rates in his notes on time, but before making any payment or giving any notes the property was edge of facts sufficient to put an ordinarily prudent man on inquiry is all that is required, and the charge of the court went too far."

A very late expression of the rule in Kansas is found in the following language taken from the opinion in Martin v. Marshall, 54 Kan. 147: "That good faith is essential to support the sale cannot be questioned. If Martin & Co. knew of the fraudulent intent of the Pelletiers, and bought with that knowledge, they cannot claim to be bona fide purchasers. 'Knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and put him upon inquiry is, as a general proposition, equivalent to knowledge of the ultimate fact.' Phillips v. Reitz, 16 Kan. 396; Tiedeman, Pers. Prop.

taken upon attachment against the fraudulent assignor, the verbal promise to pay is not sufficient to protect the title of a purchaser against such attachment. Dixon v. Hill, 5 Mich. 404 (1858).

So, an attachment of the property purchased as that of the vendor would appear to be sufficient to put the purchaser upon notice and charge him if he thereafter pays.

Thus, no one but a purchaser for a valuable consideration actually passed before notice of the fraud of the vendor can claim title to property which has been fraudulently disposed of as against attaching creditors. Bush v. Collins, 35 Kan. 535 (1886).

And a purchaser of property sold in fraud of creditors cannot be considered a bona fide purchaser where he had notice of a levy by an attaching creditor before payment of the purchase price. Young v. Kellar, 94 Mo. 581 (1887).

And where he takes possession but does not pay the purchase price until a suit is commenced by attachment against the vendor, based upon the charge that he had conveyed his property with intent to defraud his creditors, he does not occupy the position of a bona fide purchaser without notice of the attachment, though he had no knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the vendor at the time of the purchase. Cheek v. Waldron, 39 Mo. App. 21 (1890).

So, the levy of an execution by a creditor of a vendor upon goods sold and in possession of the purchaser puts him upon inquiry as to the good faith of the sale, and if he afterwards pays any part of the purchase money, he will not be deemed an innocent purchaser without notice as to such payment if the sale was fraudulent. Dougherty v. Cooper, 77 Mo. 528 (1883).

And an assignee of an account from a debtor who transfers it with intent to defraud his creditors is not entitled to be protected as a bona fide purchaser without notice in making payments upon the purchase price after service of summons upon him in a suit to set aside the transfer, although he purchased the claim in good faith without notice of any fraud. Stinson v. Racer, 2 Ohio, N. P. 316, 3 Ohio Dec. 421 (1895).

A sale made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the vendor will be upheld, however, where the purchaser bought without notice of such intent, for a valuable consideration paid before receiving such notice. Dougherty v. Cooper, supra; Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176 (1884).

And this rule does not apply so as to require a woman who has received a conveyance in consideration of marriage to refuse to marry the grantor upon receiving notice of his fraudulent intent prior to its solemnization. See Prignon v. Daussat, 4 Wash. 199 (1892), supra, V. b, Marriage settlements.

IX. Application of purchase price to debts.

A purchaser who knows, or has just reason to believe, his vendor to be insolvent, and who pays cash for the property, must see that it is applied to the discharge of the debts of the vendor in order to make valid the conveyance. Weis v. Dittman, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 35 (1893).

And the principal which requires a purchaser from a debtor known to be insolvent, to see to the application of the purchase money, requires him to see that it is lawfully paid. Ibid.

Thus, a purchaser who knowingly purchases from an insolvent debtor cannot escape liability to the debtor's creditors by the application by the debtor of the moneys paid for the purpose of preferring certain of his creditors above others after having made an assignment, as with the making of the assignment his right to prefer comes to an end. Ibid.

So, the fact that the result of a fraudulent deed is to secure the payment of a valid and bona fide debt, equal or greater in amount than the value of the property conveyed, does not remove from the deed the taint of fraud as against a grantee, chargeable with notice of the wrongful intent in its execution, and with participation therein. Cox v. Miller, 54 Tex. 16 (1880).

And a purchaser who co-operates with the vendor in the misapplication of purchase money which he knows is raised for the benefit of a third person, or either directly or indirectly aids the vendor in diverting the money, renders himself liable to the person defrauded to the extent of the funds employed. Bower v. Hadden Blue Stone Co. 30 N. J. Eq. 171 (1878).

And in Seligson v. Brown, 61 Tex. 180 (1884), it was held that a sale by a debtor in failing circumstances of his entire stock of goods for a fair consideration, with the express purpose of applying the proceeds to the payment of his debts, which is known by the purchaser to be his intent, is nevertheless illegal and void, as the law will not allow a purchaser thus to enable an insolvent debtor to avoid his creditors by giving money or negotiable bonds which cannot be reached by legal process.

But see cases set forth below.

Thus, a sale by a father in failing circumstances, of substantially all his property to his son for its fair market value without reserving any benefit, is valid though it was agreed between the parties that the price should be paid by the son directly to certain of the father's creditors, whose debts equaled the selling price. Eskridge v. Abrahams, 61 Ala. 134 (1878).

And a sale made to one not a creditor must be considered as one in the ordinary course of business when made for an adequate consideration in cash or its equivalent, and will not be vitiated by the fact that a portion of the price was subsequently applied to the discharge of the vendor's debt. Lowenstein v. Fudickar, 43 La. Ann. 886 (1891).

So, a purchaser of property from an insolvent debtor, paying for it with the negotiable promissory note of the purchaser without seeing that the consideration paid goes to the discharge of the debtor's debts, is not necessarily fraudulent as to creditors without reference to the interest of the parties. Hadock Bros. v. Hill, 75 Tex. 193 (1889).

And a sale by an insolvent debtor for cash, of goods representing all his assets, subject to execution to one who knew of his insolvency or might have known by the exercise of ordinary care, is not fraudulent in law, where the money received was applied to the debts of the vendor, unless there was an agreement at the time of the sale that the money should be so applied. Robertson v. Gourley, 84 Tex. 575 (1892).

Sales, § 329; Schulein v. Hainer, 48 Kan. 249."

By Mr. Justice Johnson, speaking for the court, in Gollober v. Martin, 33 Kan. 252, it is said: "Actual knowledge by a vendee of the fraudulent intent of the vendor is not essential to render the sale void. If the facts brought to his attention are such as to awaken suspicion, and lead a man of ordinary prudence to make inquiry, he is chargeable with notice of the fraudulent intent, and with participation in the fraud,"—citing Phillips v. Reitz, supra; Kurtz v. Miller, 26 Kan. 314; McDonald v. Gaunt, 30 Kan. 693.

In Bollman v. Lucas, 22 Neb. 796, Mr. Justice Cobb, in defining the rule of that state,

A failing debtor may sell his property in good faith to obtain money to meet his obligations though creditors are thereby hindered and delayed. State, Friedman, v. Purcell (Mo.) 33 S. W. 13 (1895).

So, purchasers from an insolvent debtor of his stock of goods, notes, and accounts, cannot be held to a fraudulent intent in paying him a sum of money as the purchase price, where they had a reasonable expectation at the time that it would be used to pay his indebtedness, and it was in fact so used. Fargason v. Hall, 99 Ala. 209 (1893).

And a purchaser of a stock of goods at its reasonable value, who was informed of certain outstanding claims, which it was made a part of the contract that he should pay and which he did pay, turning over the balance of the purchase price to the vendor, is not chargeable with notice of the vendor's intent to defraud other creditors of whom he knew nothing and had been assured by the vendor that there were none. Kelly v. Schillinger, 102 Ala. 336 (1893).

And a sale of goods by a trustee who had appropriated a trust fund with the intention of applying the purchase money in replacing the trust moneys, which were misapplied, which intent was known to the purchaser, and the purchase money was to his knowledge immediately after its payment placed to the credit of such trust fund, is not a fraudulent transfer of property within the provisions of the bankruptcy act. Ex parte Stubbins, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 58, 50 L. J. Ch. 547, 44 L. T. N. S. 877, 29 Week. Rep. 653 (1880).

So, an actual sale of goods for money, the vendor intending to use the purchase money in making a voluntary payment, the purchaser knowing of such intention, is not a fraudulent transfer within the provisions of the bankruptcy act of 1869. Ibid.

And a sale of cattle and farm utensils at their full value under an agreement that the purchase money should be applied in payment of the debts of the vendor, which was done, after which the vendor became the tenant of the vendee and used the property sold in the same manner as he had previously done, furnishes no evidence of a trust between the vendor and vendee, and is valid as against creditors. Talcott v. Wilcox, 9 Conn. 134 (1832).

And an exchange by an insolvent merchant of his merchandise for real estate of equal value which is subject to the demands of his creditors does not require the party with whom he exchanges to see to it that the land is applied in payment of his debts, though he is aware of his insolvency. Chessher v. Clamp (Tex.) 30 S. W. 466 (1895).

And in Jones v. Hudson, 23 S. C. 494 (1885), it was held that a purchaser from a trustee under a lost deed, authorized to make sales and reinvest the proceeds, is not bound to see the proper application of the proceeds.

But, where one purchases the whole of a debtor's property subject to execution, knowing that his vendor is largely indebted and has recently declared his intention not to pay, the mere fact that the debtor assures him at the time of the sale that one purpose of it is to enable him to pay debts will not purge the transaction of bad faith or relieve the purchaser from the duty to see to it that the purchase money is actually applied so far as is necessary to the discharge of such debts. Avery v. Johann, 27 Wis. 246 (1870).

And knowledge on the part of a purchaser that his vendor was unable to meet and discharge his debts as they became due in the ordinary course of his business, and that by such sale he would devest himself of all property not exempt from forced sale, and the payment to him of purchase money without seeing that it was applied by him to the payment of his debts, render the sale fraudulent and void as to creditors, though the debtor promises to apply the proceeds in payment of his debts and the purchaser believes that he will do so. Proetzel v. Buckstove & R. Co. (Tex.) 26 S. W. 1110 (1894).

X. Effect of assumption of vendor's debts.

A purchase of a stock of goods from an insolvent debtor for a sufficient consideration, including an agreement by which the purchaser pays debts of the vendor, is valid as against creditors, unless it was done for the purpose of aiding the debtor to delay or defraud his creditors. Sweet v. Wright, 57 Iowa, 510 (1881).

The right of a debtor to sell to a third party for a fair price, the latter agreeing to pay the consideration upon certain specified debts due by him, is equal to his right to prefer certain of his creditors by transferring property to them in satisfaction of their debts, which he may do provided he does not transfer more than is reasonably sufficient for the purpose. Sweeney v. Conley, 71 Tex. 543 (1888).

Thus a sale by an insolvent debtor to his brother in consideration of the agreement of the brother to pay debts of the insolvent amounting to more than the value of the property conveyed is not fraudulent as against a creditor whose debt was not included in the agreement. Baker v. Harvey (Mo.) 34 S. W. 853 (1896).

And a conveyance of land by a member of an insolvent partnership which made an assignment for the benefit of creditors upon the same day, in consideration for which the grantee assumed the payment of debts due from the grantor to third persons to about the amount of the purchase price, which assumption was accepted, will not be set aside as fraudulent and void as to creditors where the grantee did not know that the assets of the firm were insufficient to pay its debts, though he did know of the assignment. Smith v. Selz, 114 Ind. 229 (1887).

So, such a conveyance by an insolvent debtor, for which the grantee paid at least three fourths of the actual value by the redemption of certain wheat-warehouse receipts of the grantor, concerning which he was then liable to a criminal prosecution, and the discharge of certain obligations on which he was surety, do not warrant the conclusion that the conveyance was made or taken with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Neal v. Foster, 36 Fed. Rep. 29 (1888).

And a conveyance made upon the consideration in part of the payment by the grantee of certain debts of the grantor and the future support of the grantor by the grantee is founded upon a valuable consideration, and consequently can be fraudulent only so far as the grantee is concerned, when mala fides are justly attributable to him. He must be cognizant of the fraudulent intent of the grantor if and speaking for the court, said: "Throughout the series of instructions given at the request of the plaintiff, the jury are told, more or less explicitly, that while the sale of the goods by McClintock & Wilson may have been made with whatever fraudulent intent to hinder, delay, and defraud their creditors, although this fraudulent intent on their part may have been known to the plaintiff, yet if the purchase on his part was made bona fide and solely for the purpose of collecting a debt due him from them, then the sale is good and unaffected by the fraudulent intent of McClintock & Wilson. This is not the law as understood by this court. In the case of Temple v. Smith, 13 Neb. 513, cited by counsel for there was one. Henderson v. Hunton, 26 Gratt. 926 (1875).

And that notes taken for the unpaid price for goods sold absolutely and unconditionally were to be used in payment of the vendor's debts does not establish fraud in the sale as to creditors. Miller v. Kirby, 74 Ill. 242 (1874).

And in Farmers' Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469 (1848), it was held that a purchase of property worth nearly $200,000, for which the purchaser agrees to pay certain debts of the vendor amounting to about $13,000 less than the value of the property, leaving the general creditors of the vendor unpaid and nothing to pay them with, does not of itself show such a fraudulent intent as will require the cancelation of the sale.

Though in that case it was also held that the fact that such a purchaser agreed to pay encumbrances, nearly if not quite equal in amount to the value of the property purchased, did not make him a bona fide purchaser without notice of his vendor's fraud, who would be protected by the statute of frauds.

But a conveyance by a debtor with intent to defraud a creditor, in which the grantee purchased with a view to aid that intention, is fraudulent and void, though the purchaser paid full value in satisfying bona fide debts of the debtor. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. L. 324, 23 Am. Dec. 140 (1831).

And a conveyance by a father owning property in excess of his indebtedness, of all his valuable property to his daughter, and his delivery to a son-in-law of a large sum of money in consideration of a promise by them to pay certain indebtedness, excluding therefrom other items of indebtedness of which they had knowledge at the time of the conveyance, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Lewis v. Linscott, 37 Kan 379 (1887).

And a conveyance by a debtor to his brother, residing within a mile, of all his property including his household and kitchen furniture for a consideration of 30 to 40 per cent less than its real value, the purchaser assuming to pay certain debts for which he was bound as security, leaving other debts unprovided for, authorizes the conclusion that the purchaser participated in the fraudulent intent of the vendor, and will be held invalid as to creditors. Foster v. Grigsby, 1 Bush, 86 (1866).

It is a question for the jury, where a failing debtor has all of his property on which he obtained credit incorporated under a manufacturing charter and divided into shares between his father and himself, the father having afterwards paid debts of his son with his share of the stock, whether such transaction was done with intent to defraud creditors, and whether the father knew of or had reasonable grounds for suspicion of such intent. Planters' & M. Bank v. Willeo Cotton Mills, 60 Ga. 168 (1878).

XI. Effect of relationship or intimacy of the parties.

The fact that a vendor and purchaser are relatives raises no presumption of fraud in the transaction. Fraser v. Passage (Mich.) 30 N. W. 334 (1886).

Dealings of an insolvent debtor in property with his relatives are not necessarily fraudulent transactions. Blish v. Collins, 68 Mich. 542 (1888).

But see Reese v. Shell, and Satterwhite v. Hicks, infra, in this subdivision.

Thus the fact that the parties to a conveyance are mother-in-law and son-in-law does not show fraudulent collusion between them which will shift the burden of proof of bona fides to the purchaser. Tompkins v. Nichols, 53 Ala. 197 (1875).

And a conveyance to a grantee for an adequate consideration will not be deemed fraudulent merely because he was related to the grantors and afterwards released the property to them. Bradley v. Ragsdale, 64 Ala. 559 (1879).

And a purchaser will not be held chargeable with knowledge of the fraudulent intent of his grantor because the parties were brothers-in-law, and the grantor visited the purchaser for the purpose of making the sale, and the purchaser bought the land without having seen it, which was not worth as much as he professed to have paid for it, and he did not satisfactorily account for his acquisition of the money paid for it, and the grantor continued in possession, where the visit was brought about by a letter written by the purchaser, though it had been lost and was not produced in evidence and the grantor's continued possession was that of a laborer. Steele v. Ward, 25 Iowa, 535 (1868).

So, the mere fact that a purchaser from the holder of a conveyance founded upon the consideration of blood or marriage has notice that it was not founded upon a pecuniary consideration is not sufficient to make it his duty at his peril to inquire whether the title of his grantor was not fraudulent. He has the right to act upon the legal presumption that such deed was honestly made, unless some other fact is brought to his knowledge calculated to raise a suspicion in his mind that the conveyance was made with a fraudulent intent. Frazer v. Western, 1 Barb. Ch. 220 (1845).

And evidence that a purchaser of several insurance policies was a brother-in-law of one of the vendors whose place of business had been destroyed by fire, and that he traded with them and was treated as other customers were, and that he knew nothing of their business and made no inquiry, supposing that they were buying and selling for cash, and was not aware of the fact that they were indebted to any one except himself, and that a statement of their assets and liabilities showed notes and accounts amounting to $7,000, and the offer to sell was made for the express purpose of paying him and getting money with which to commence business, and that it was generally believed that they would begin business again,—will not authorize or support a finding that the purchaser had knowledge of such facts as would have aroused the suspicion of an ordinarily prudent man as to their fraudulent intent in making the transfer. Cooper v. Martin Brown Co. 78 Tex. 219 (1890).

But when the good faith of a debtor's transfer of goods is in question, the relationship of the parties to the transfer is a fact for the consideration of the jury. Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 39 (1885).

The jury, and not the court, are to weigh the fact of relationship of the parties to a transfer upon the question of the fraudulent intent of the vendee, and give it such effect as they may deem proper. Ibid.

And relationship or intimacy, in connection with other facts and circumstances, is often deemed sufficient to show fraud and invalidate the transfer.

Thus a conveyance of property of great value by an embarrassed debtor to a near relative in secret, plaintiff in error, the court, in the opinion of the present chief justice, says: 'But where a purchaser has notice of the fraudulent intent of the person from whom he purchases, or has notice of such facts as would put men of ordinary prudence upon inquiry which would have led to a knowledge of the fraudulent purpose of the person selling the goods, he is not a bona fide purchaser,'—citing Zuver v. Lyons, 40 Iowa, 510; Jones v. Hetherington, 45 Iowa, 681; Bradford v. Beyer, 17 Ohio St. 388; Brown v. Cutler, 8 Ohio, 142."

The same rule is announced in Dorrington v. Minnick, 15 Neb. 397.

In Hooser v. Hunt, 65 Wis. 71, Cole, Ch. J., announces the well-settled rule of that state in will be presumed to be fraudulent, but where the parties testify to the fairness of the conveyance and deny any purpose to defraud, the question of the intent is for the jury. Helms v. Green, 105 N. C. 251 (1890); Reiger v. Davis, 67 N. C. 185 (1872).

And the neglect of near relatives to voluntarily explain suspicious circumstances connected with the conveyance between them will be deemed to be due to an inability to show conduct consistent with an honest purpose, and a presumption of fraud arises from their failure to explain and prove facts known to them tending to show good faith, if such facts existed. Helms v. Green, supra.

And the burden of proof rests with a wife who has received a fraudulent conveyance from her husband to show clearly that she acted in good faith, and was not only ignorant of, but had no grounds for reasonable suspicion as to her husband's fraudulent intent. Reese v. Shell, 95 Ga. 749 (1895).

And a purchase at an inadequate price by a minor son without means, residing with his father, from such father, will be held invalid where the father was generally known to be in failing circumstances and had transferred other property to his other children in fraud of creditors. Massie v. Enyart, 32 Ark. 257 (1877).

So, a deed by an insolvent father to his son in the presence of another son, nothing else appearing, raises a presumption of fraud as to creditors which will cast the burden of proof upon the grantee to protect his title by showing that he is a purchaser for value and without notice of his grantor's fraudulent intent. Tredwell v. Graham, 88 N. C. 208 (1883).

And the rule that he who alleges fraud must prove it does not apply to a case in which it is claimed by creditors that a sale was fraudulent in which the vendor and the subscribing witnesses and the purchaser were all brothers-in-law, and the vendor was indebted beyond his power to pay, and a writ had issued against him to recover a debt due from him. Satterwhite v. Hicks, Busbee, L. 105, 57 Am. Dec. 577 (1852).

And a conveyance by a debtor of all his property to a brother who lived with him and sustained intimate relations with him will be deemed fraudulent, although a valuable consideration was paid, where it appears that judgment had been obtained against the grantor, who said that the judgment creditor would never get a cent, as he would fix it so that he could not, and the deed was made on the day of the judgment but not delivered until after a motion for a new trial, and the grantor had received a large amount of cash therefor without applying any of it upon the judgment, and the grantee had said he had purchased his brother's place because he had got into trouble and did not want to have any property. O'Leary v. Duvall, 10 Wash. 666 (1895).

And the fact that a deed given by a father conveying all his property to his two sons purports to have been given for a valuable consideration, and the statements of the sons under oath that it was so given and was bona fide, will not sustain it as against the father's creditors where the circumstances as to the time, method, and consideration therefor were suspicious. Hoboken Bank v. Beckman, 36 N. J. Eq. 83 (1882).

In Hoboken Bank v. Beckman, supra, Fifield v. Gaston, 12 Iowa, 218 (1861), was distinguished on the ground that in that case a conveyance was not made to a son but to a stranger and creditor of the grantor for wages for work done for the latter, the consideration was proved, and the grantee claimed that the deed was merely a mortgage to secure his debt.

So, a purchase from an insolvent debtor of his entire property, subject to the payment of his debts, making a cash payment of $500 and giving notes for the balance, without making any inquiry as to the vendor's financial status, where the vendee was well acquainted with him and in a position to have some knowledge of his business, is invalid as against the vendor's creditors, where the prosecution of such an inquiry to but a limited extent must have resulted in the acquisition of the knowledge that the sale would be invalid as to his creditors and a fraud upon their rights. Ullman v. Crenshaw (Tex.) 16 S. W. 1012 (1891).

And a sale made by an embarrassed debtor to a friend and relative whom he summoned from a distance to him, purchasing at a price considerably less than the fair market price of the property, and less than the amount of his debts, after a secret conference with the avowed intention of protecting the property from being sacrificed by creditors at sales under legal process, will be deemed to be fraudulent, and will be upheld only as to the consideration paid which was actually applied to the payment of the debts of the vendor. Barrow v. Bailey, 5 Fla. 9 (1853).

So, a sister to whom a brother, during the pendency of an action against him for divorce and alimony brought by his wife, executes a note and trust deed for the purpose of preventing the wife from obtaining any benefit under her judgment for alimony, acquires no rights as against such judgment when obtained, although she previously held notes against her brother, where the new note and trust deed were not given to pay or secure them. Hall v. Harrington (Colo.) 44 Pac. 365 (1896).

And a verdict setting aside a transfer as fraudulent as against creditors will not be deemed contrary to evidence where it appears that the debtor, who was in failing circumstances, had transferred all that remained of his estate to his two sons, and that the payments for the land by the sons were proved only by themselves, though there were witnesses to the deeds and it appeared that some of them could have been proved by disinterested witnesses in another county, and there was no change of possession. Smith v. Wellborn, 75 Ga. 799 (1885).

A purchase by a woman who had been made a sole trader when her husband's affairs were embarrassed, of his property to a considerable amount, when she had pursued no separate business by which she might have acquired separate property, is bound to show from what sources she derived the funds to make the purchase, and in default of such showing her purchase will be declared fraudulent and void. Miller v. Tollison, Harp. Eq. 145, 14 Am. Dec. 712 (1824).

But the rule that it is the duty of a married woman, claiming against her husband's creditors, to show that her claim is bona fide and for a consideration growing out of her separate estate, does not apply in a case in which she does not claim through a judgment against him, but as grantee the following language: "The words 'actual notice' in § 2243, Rev. Stat. and 'previous notice' in § 2324, Rev. Stat. are equivalent expressions; and the rule is stated in the opinion 'that notice must be held to be actual when the subsequent purchaser has actual knowledge of such facts as would put a prudent man upon inquiry which, if prosecuted with ordinary diligence, would lead to actual notice of the right or title in conflict with that which he is about to purchase. Where the subsequent purchaser has knowledge of such facts, it becomes his duty to make inquiry, and he is guilty of bad faith if he neglects to do so, and consequently he will be charged with the actual notice he would have received if he had of another judgment creditor. Evans v. Kilgore, 147 Pa. 19 (1891).

Where a wife is a beneficiary in a deed of conveyance from her husband which is impeached by a creditor for fraud, it is scarcely to be supposed that the circumstances and intentions of the grantor were unknown to her. Castro v. Illies, 22 Tex. 479, 73 Am. Dec. 277 (1858).

As to effect of relationship or intimacy in connection with continued possession by a vendor, see supra, VII. e, Retention of possession.

XII. Effect of fraud in other transactions.

Other transactions occurring at or about the same time are not sufficient to show a participation by a grantee in the fraudulent intent of the grantor which will invalidate the conveyance as against the grantee, though they may be competent as proving the insolvency and fraudulent intent of the grantor. Hoyt & Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523 (1887).

And where it is contemplated to impeach a conveyance on the ground of fraud, evidence that the grantor made other conveyances at about the same time, which were fraudulent, is admissible to prove the grantor's fraudulent design, but cannot affect the grantee unless followed by evidence of his participation in some way in the fraud. Howe v. Reed, 12 Me. 515 (1855); Blake v. White, 13 N. H. 267 (1842).

A transfer by a debtor to his father and sister of promissory notes given by the purchaser of a stock of goods sold on credit, made several days after the sale without the purchaser's knowledge, however, does not show fraud on his part. Shealy v. Edwards, 75 Ala. 411 (1883).

XIII. Registration and failure to record.

The registry of a sheriff's deed made on execution under a judgment against one who had purchased lands and, to defraud his creditors, had the title made to another, who transferred the property to a third person without notice of the fraud, is not notice to such purchaser of the fraud. Registry is only notice to avoid purchases from the same grantor. Crockett v. Maguire, 10 Mo. 34 (1875).

And an examination by a purchaser of the records to see if there was any lien or encumbrances upon the land purchased does not show an absence of knowledge on his part that he would thereby enable his vendor to defraud his creditors. Wood v. Chambers, 20 Tex. 247, 70 Am. Dec. 382 (1857).

So, the failure of a purchaser to file a deed for record does not render the transaction fraudulent per se, though it is a circumstance to be considered in arriving at a conclusion as to the presence or absence of actual fraud. Klein v. Richardson, 64 Miss. 41 (1886), Overruling Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 309 (1872).

And the failure of a grantee to file his conveyance does not tend to impeach the good faith of the transfer where it does not appear that it was purposely kept from the records and that any one was prejudiced by the delay. Crabb v. Morrissey, 31 Neb. 161 (1891).

So, the delay of a son in recording a deed given him by his father will not invalidate it as against creditors, where he did not know of any claims against his father or that he was in debt, embarrassed, or insolvent. Second Nat. Bank v. Merrill, 81 Wis. 142 (1891).

Withholding conveyances from record for several months after they were made is not a circumstance of fraud where the parties lived some distance away from the recording office and explained their failure to record. Bish v. Collins, 68 Mich. 542 (1888).

And the neglect of a wife for several years to record a conveyance made to her by her husband in contemplation of their marriage, together with his continued occupation of the lands conveyed after the marriage, and the mortgaging of the land by the husband and wife for his benefit, do not raise a presumption of fraudulent intent in making the conveyance. Page v. Kendrick, 10 Mich. 300 (1862).

XIV. Purchases from fraudulent grantees.

The rule was originally laid down by Chancellor Kent that a bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent grantee acquires no title by the conveyance against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, as the object of the statute of frauds is to secure creditors from being defrauded by the debtor. Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371 (1818).

But the contrary doctrine that a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration from a fraudulent grantee acquires good title to the property purchased as against creditors of the original vendor now seems to be well settled.

This was held in Paige v. O'Neal, 12 Cal. 483 (1859); Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258 (1850); Scott v. Purcell, 7 Blackf. 66, 39 Am. Dec. 453 (1843); Dugan v. Vattier, 3 Blackf. 245, 25 Am. Dec. 105 (1833); Neal v. Williams, 18 Me. 391 (1841); Gordon v. Ritenour, 87 Mo. 54 (1885); Wineland v. Coonce, 5 Mo. 296, 32 Am. Dec. 320 (1838); Jackson, Bartlett, v. Henry, 10 Johns. 185, 6 Am. Dec. 328 (1813); King v. Trice, 3 Ired. Eq. 568 (1845); Thompson v. McKean, 1 Ashm. 129 (1830); Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252 (1821).

In Bean v. Smith, supra, Roberts v. Anderson, supra, was criticised, the court refusing to follow it so far as it held that a purchaser in good faith from a grantee who took with intent to defraud creditors is not protected by the statute of Elizabeth.

And it was held that a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration is protected against creditors under the statute of frauds whether he purchased from a fraudulent grantor or a fraudulent grantee, in Howe v. Waysman, 12 Mo. 169, 49 Am. Dec. 126 (1848); Tootle v. Dunn, 6 Neb. 93 (1877); Anderson v. Roberts, 18 Johns. 515, 9 Am. Dec. 235 (1820); Hood v. Fahnestock, 8 Watts, 489, 34 Am. Dec. 489 (1839); Mateer v. Hissim, 3 Penr. & W. 160 (1831).

Thus, to subject lands sold to a vendee and by him sold to another, to a judgment against the original vendor, the judgment creditor must show that the original vendor had sold with intent to defraud, and that both his vendee and the subsequent vendee had notice of such intent. Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258 (1850).

A fraudulent purchaser acquires title which is good until the vendor elects to rescind, and a sale by the purchaser for value to a third person, who is ignorant of the fraud, vests good title in the lat-made the inquiry.'" This language was used in a case involving, as the one at bar does, the question of a fraudulent conveyance to hinder and delay creditors, and the case is fully parallel to the one at bar, because, as heretofore suggested, we have a statute with reference to actual and constructive notice in this territory, and which provides that (Stat. 1893, p. 2673) "every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, and who omits to make such inquiry with reasonable diligence, is deemed to have constructive notice of the fact itself."

In Singer v. Jacobs, 11 Fed. Rep. 559, Judge Caldwell, stating the opinion for the court, after holding that, to avoid a sale on the ground of fraud, it is not necessary that the purchaser should have actual notice of the fraudulent purpose of the vendor, uses the following language of Bigelow on Frauds (p. 288): "If facts are brought to the knowledge of a party which would put him, as a man of common sagacity, upon inquiry, he is bound to inquire; and, if he neglect to do so, he will be chargeable with notice of what he might have learned upon examination."

Bump, in his treatise on Fraudulent Conveyances, sums up the rule, on page 201, as follows: "It is not necessary that the grantee ter, even as against the original vendor. Levi v. Bray, 12 Ind. App. 9 (1895).

And property fraudulently conveyed under such circumstances as to create a trust in favor of creditors cannot be subjected to the payment of the grantor's debts as against one who purchased and paid a valuable consideration in good faith without notice of the fraudulent purpose. Carnahan v. McCord, 116 Ind. 67 (1888).

And a bona fide purchaser of property conveyed by a debtor in trust for his wife and family, though fraudulent as against creditors, which was sold by the cestui que trust prior to any interference on their part, will be protected in law. Sparrow v. Chesley, 19 Me. 79 (1841).

So, a bona fide purchase for value from the president of an insolvent corporation of property which he had purchased from the company for an antecedent debt due him is valid as against the creditors of the company, though the sale by the company to the president was void as to such creditors. Heroy v. Kerr, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 359 (1866).

And a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration of property consisting of all of the effects of a partnership which had been conveyed by the partners in payment of their individual indebtedness takes title as against firm creditors. Jewett v. Meech, 101 Ind. 289 (1884).

And the equitable title of a bona fide purchaser for a sufficient consideration, from a wife to whom the property purchased had been fraudulently conveyed by her husband, will be preferred and enforced in equity as against the claims of a creditor who has obtained judgment against the husband and levied on the lands conveyed. Phelps v. Morrison, 25 N. J. Eq. 538 (1874).

And a purchaser for a valuable consideration from a wife of property which had been paid for by her husband, who caused the conveyance to be taken in her name with the intent to hinder and delay his creditors, takes good title as against such creditors where he had no notice of the fraud. Carnahan v. McCord, 116 Ind. 67 (1888).

So, the title of a purchaser in good faith at a sale under a chattel mortgage is not affected by the fact that the mortgage was executed in pursuance of a conspiracy between the mortgagor and the mortgagee to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the mortgagor. Zoeller v. Riley, 100 N. Y. 102, 53 Am. Rep. 157 (1885).

And the title of a bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent grantee, made before the lands were sold under an execution, issued on a judgment in favor of a creditor and against the original grantor, is superior to that of a purchaser under the execution. Young v. Lathrop, 67 N. C. 63, 12 Am. Rep. 603 (1872).

So, the title of a purchaser in good faith from an assignee for the benefit of creditors is not affected by the fact that the assignment is subsequently set aside as in fraud of creditors. Wilson v. Marion, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1066 (1893).

And an innocent purchaser of property which had been fraudulently conveyed to his grantor, who had paid but part of the purchase price, and who afterwards took an assignment of a judgment which had been obtained against the original fraudulent grantor and under which the lands had been levied upon and a bill of equity filed to set aside the sale, can be held only as an equitable garnishee to the amount of the judgment; but if he had in fact purchased the judgment at a discount, he would be allowed as a credit on the unpaid purchase money only the sum he had paid for the judgment with interest, as he could not be permitted to speculate upon the purchase. Tappan v. Harbison, 43 Ark. 84 (1884).

A purchaser of land from one claiming the same under a deed held to be fraudulent, however, stands in no better condition than the fraudulent donee himself, and cannot deed such lands with any other or greater effect than his grantor, unless his purchase was made for a valuable consideration and without notice of the fraud. Wade v. Saunders, 70 N. C. 270 (1874).

And a purchaser from a fraudulent grantee with notice of his fraud cannot be protected as a bona fide purchaser, and can acquire no better title than his immediate grantor had. Goshhorn v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717 (1881).

And where a subpurchaser from a vendee under a fraudulent conveyance had notice of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry, the sale will be set aside though it is not shown that he had knowledge of the original fraud. Hoyt & Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Turner, 84 Ala. 523 (1887).

And a party claiming protection as a bona fide purchaser or mortgagee from a fraudulent grantee must deny notice of the fraud, although notice is not charged in the bill of the creditor. Manhattan Co. v. Evertson, 6 Paige, 457 (1837).

So, a purchaser of goods from one who obtained the goods by a fraudulent purchase takes them subject to the right of the original vendor to disaffirm, where he had knowledge of the means by which his vendor obtained them; but such knowledge would not affect his title if the first vendor elected to affirm the sale. Gray v. St. John, 35 Ill. 222 (1864).

And a purchaser of lands from a married woman, who knew that they had been conveyed by her husband to a third person for an alleged consideration of $4,000, and immediately thereafter were reconveyed to the wife for the same consideration, and that the husband was overwhelmed with debt at the time, and that the wife had no means to pay the $4,000, cannot be deemed a bona fide purchaser without notice. Smith v. Vreeland, 16 N. J. Eq. 198 (1863).

And one who purchases knowing that his vendor had not complied with the terms of his contract by which he purchased the goods sold, and that the original vendor insisted upon his right by reason of such default to retake the property, and states that he did not care what the original vendor claimed shall have actual knowledge of the debtor's intent to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors in order to render the transfer void. A knowledge of facts sufficient to excite the suspicions of a prudent man and to put him on the inquiry, or to lead a person of ordinary perception to infer fraud, or the means of knowing by the use of ordinary diligence, amounts to notice and is equivalent to actual knowledge in contemplation of law. . . . If he has notice of facts sufficient to put him on the inquiry, he cannot be deemed a bona fide purchaser." On page 203 he says: "It is not necessary that the debtor and the grantee shall be actuated by like motives to cheat and defraud the grantor's creditors. The motives and intentions of the debtor and grantee may be different. If the grantee has notice at the time that the debtor is transferring his property to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors, it will make the transfer void although he has no wish to defraud them, for the motive is imputed to him as a fraud in law, and makes him a mala fide purchaser."

A consideration of the numerous cases cited can certainly leave no doubt but that the instruction on the question here in controversy, and which was in the case of Chandler v. Colcord, held erroneous, was correct, and that the instruction which was asked for in the court and did not try to find out, is chargeable with notice of such claim, and takes the title of his vendor as it is, subject to the claims of the original vendor. Thompson v. Duff, 19 Ill. App. 75 (1886).

So, one who purchases of a fraudulent grantee who had received a fraudulent conveyance from his brother, with knowledge of a suit against the original vendor, and of the relations between him and his immediate vendor, and of the fact that his vendor's deed was recorded just before judgment was entered in such action, is not an innocent purchaser, the facts being sufficient to put him upon inquiry. Hamlin v. Wright, 26 Wis. 50 (1870).

And a purchaser in good faith from a fraudulent grantee will not be protected as to purchase moneys paid by him after service of summons upon him in an action by a judgment creditor of his vendor's grantor to have the several sales adjudged fraudulent and his judgment declared a lien on the land. Ibid.

And a sale of a stock of goods and bank accounts by a fraudulent purchaser who had taken them from a previous fraudulent vendor who intended to hinder and defraud his creditors, made to an employee upon receiving information that an attachment was about to be levied thereon as the property of the fraudulent vendor, taking his notes therefor, does not make such employee a bona fide purchaser. Lane v. Starkey, 15 Neb. 285 (1883).

But the knowledge of a second vendee that a sale by a bankrupt to his first vendee embraced all of the stock of the seller, without more, will not make the purchase of the second vendee fraudulent in law. Babbitt v. Walbrun, 1 Dill. 15 (1870).

And that a purchaser from a fraudulent grantee who acquired the property in fraud of his grantor's creditors took title under a quitclaim deed is not conclusive evidence that he is not a purchaser in good faith and without notice. Mansfield v. Dyer, 131 Mass. 200 (1881).

So, a daughter who for a valuable consideration purchased from her mother land fraudulently conveyed to the latter by her father a year previous while he was largely indebted is not, in the absence of further evidence of fraud on her part, so chargeable with notice of the father's fraudulent purpose as to render the conveyance invalid. Leich v. Dee, 86 Iowa, 711 (1892).

And in Dalglish v. McCarthy, 19 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 578 (1872), it was held that a bona fide purchaser from a grantee, who gave no consideration but took a conveyance which was fraudulent as to creditors, acquires title as against creditors, notwithstanding the fact that he had notice of the former fraud and purchased the property with a view of carrying out the intent to defeat creditors.

A purchaser who buys from an innocent grantee will be protected under the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth though he took with notice of a fraudulent intent upon the part of the original vendor. Colquitt v. Thomas, 8 Ga. 258 (1850).

XV. Presumptions and burden of proof.

The presumptions and burden of proof here considered are those relating to participation by a purchaser in the fraud of his vendor only, and not those relating to fraud in general.

The law presumes the possession of a vendee to have been rightfully acquired, and where it appears that a sufficient consideration was paid the transfer will be upheld, unless it appears affirmatively that he purchased in bad faith. Jones v. Simpson, 116 U. S. 609, 29 L. ed. 742 (1885).

And a sale of property for a valuable consideration, accompanied by a bona fide change of possession, will not be presumed to have been made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, without proof of fraud in which both parties participated. Dardenne v. Hardwick, 9 Ark. 482 (1849); Glenn v. Grover, 3 Md. Ch. 29 (1850).

And a purchaser will not be held chargeable with notice of the fraudulent intent of his vendor where the circumstances relied upon to prove his knowledge are just as consistent with ignorance as with knowledge. Steele v. Ward, 25 Iowa, 535 (1868); Muirheid v. Smith, 35 N. J. Eq. 303 (1882).

And the burden of proof rests with the attacking creditor to show fraud in a transfer and participation in the fraud of the vendee. Deering v. Collins, 38 Mo. App. 73 (1889); Van Raalte v. Harrington, 101 Mo. 602, 11 L. R. A. 424 (1890); Lipscomb v. McClellan, 72 Ala. 151 (1882).

And to show that it was made with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors, and that the purchaser had knowledge of such intention or had information of circumstances which ought to have put him on inquiry and which would have led to knowledge of such intent. Stix v. Keith, 85 Ala. 465 (1888); Lipscomb v. McClellan, supra; Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394 (1891); Hodges Bros. v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103 (1884); Knower v. Cadden Clothing Co. 57 Conn. 202 (1889); First Nat. Bank v. Carter, 89 Ind. 317 (1883); Kellogg v. Aherin, 48 Iowa, 299 (1878); Pettingill v. Jones, 30 Mo. App. 280 (1888).

Or of the debtor's financial condition. Smith v. Collins, supra.

And such knowledge must be proved as a fact, and not be imputed by any rule of law. Knower v. Cadden Clothing Co., and Van Raalte v. Harrington, supra.

And proof of the execution and the delivery of a deed by a debtor casts the burden of proof upon creditors to impeach it for inadequacy of consideration, or as intended to delay, defeat, or defraud creditors, though the same proof establishes that the grantor was in failing circumstances. Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 89, 22 Am. Dec. 400 (1831).

It is sufficient in the first instance for a creditor attacking a sale by his debtor as fraudulent to show the debtor's fraudulent intent in making it; then it is for the purchaser to show that he purchased for a valuable consideration; and his title would then be unimpeachable unless the creditor should below should have been given. The jury were directly told that they could not hold the transfer void as to G. W. Sherman, even though they should find it was fraudulently made by J. R. Sherman, unless they should find that G. W. Sherman had notice of the fraud which J. R. Sherman was perpetrating upon his creditors, if his conduct was fraudulent. This did not go far enough, in view of the request made by the plaintiff. The plaintiff was entitled, on his request, to have had the jury directed that it was not necessary that G. W. Sherman should have had actual notice of the fraud of J. R. Sherman, if there was any, but that plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, if there was fraud in the transfer, and if G. W. Sherman had notice of such facts as would cause him, as a prudent man, to suspect the fraudulent conduct of the brother, if the jury should find there was any. The instruction there given, at least against the plaintiff's request, required too high a standard of proof in order to enable make it appear that he had previous notice of the debtor's fraudulent intent or that he participated in the fraud. Starin v. Kelly, 88 N. Y. 418 (1882); Tillman v. Heller, 78 Tex. 597, 11 L. R. A. 628 (1890).

An intent to defraud creditors will be presumed, however, where the parties knew that such would be the effect of the conveyance. Nichols v. Nichols, 61 Vt. 426 (1889).

As to presumptions and burden of proof under particular circumstances and conditions, and as to particular facts, see preceding particular subdivisions of this note.

XVI. Effect of participation.

A conveyance in which there is actual fraud, both parties participating, is utterly void ab initio, and will not be permitted to stand as security for any purpose. Henderson v. Hunton, 26 Gratt. 926 (1875).

And it should not be permitted to stand as security in the hands of the grantee for advances made on account of such conveyance to the grantor. Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252 (1821).

And one who receives a conveyance of property from a debtor with knowledge that it was made with intent to defraud his creditors incurs the peril of losing that which he receives, without any right to reimbursement for what he may have paid. Dictum in Smith v. Selz, 114 Ind. 229 (1887).

And if any portion of the consideration recited in a bill of sale was not real but fictitious, the transfer would be fraudulent and void as against creditors as to the whole. Brasher v. Jamison, 75 Tex. 139 (1889).

So, a deed which is fraudulent in fact is void in toto, and cannot stand as security for grantees who had notice of the fraud. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883).

And a purchaser at a sheriff's sale made by means of a fraudulent combination with the judgment debtor cannot hold the property purchased as security for the money he has paid, though such money was his own. Stovall v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 8 Smedes & M. 505, 47 Am. Dec. 85 (1847).

And the creditors of a mortgagor to the state to secure a loan from the sinking fund, whose property is sold and who for the purpose of defrauding them agrees with the purchaser that he shall not reinstate the mortgage but hold the lands in trust for the mortgagor and permit him to redeem them whenever his relations with his creditors would permit, are entitled to have the property applied to the payment of their claims without refunding the amount paid by the purchaser. Musselman v. Kent, 33 Ind. 452 (1870).

But where a deed is merely constructively fraudulent, or where it appears that the grantee has acted bona fide and did not participate in the fraud, it will be permitted to stand as security for what is justly due to the grantee thereon, or for advances made by him subsequent to its execution. Henderson v. Hunton, supra.

And a purchaser of property from an absconding debtor with notice that he was selling to deprive creditors of their recourse to it will be entitled to restitution for that part of the consideration paid which enured to the benefit of the creditors by increasing the amount applicable to the payment of debts. Barker v. Phillips, 11 Rob. (La.) 190 (1845).

And a conveyance by a debtor with intent to defraud creditors, to a creditor, which is absolute in form, may be treated as security simply for an indebtedness to him, and the property ordered sold and the proceeds after discharging the grantee's debts subjected to the claims of other creditors, where the proof of fraudulent participation on the part of the grantee is not clear and satisfactory. Keeder v. Murphy, 43 Iowa, 413 (1876).

But a sale by an embarrassed debtor to a friend and relative at an inadequate price and for less than the amount of his debts, after a secret conference, with the intention of protecting the property from being sacrificed by creditors at sales under legal process, will be deemed fraudulent and can be upheld only as to the consideration paid which was actually applied to the payment of the vendor's debts. Barrow v. Bailey, 5 Fla. 9 (1853).

And an innocent purchaser of property which has been fraudulently conveyed to his grantor, who had paid but part of the purchase price, and who afterwards took an assignment of a judgment which had been obtained against the original fraudulent grantor and under which the lands had been levied upon, can only be held as an equitable garnishee to the amount of the judgment; but if he had in fact purchased the judgment at a discount, he would be allowed as a credit on the unpaid purchase money only the sum he had paid for the judgment with interest. Tappan v. Harbison, 43 Ark. 84 (1884).

So, a deed to several grantees jointly, executed by the grantor with intent to defraud his creditors, is void as to such grantees as had notice of the fraud, but may stand as security for the consideration paid by such grantees as had no notice. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585 (1883).

But where a father grants premises by joint deeds to his son and another, for which the third party pays a valuable consideration but the son pays nothing, and the fact of such want of consideration on the part of the son is known to the third party, the conveyance is wholly void as against creditors of the grantor at the date of the deed. Swartz v. Hazlett, 8 Cal. 118 (1857).

And the participation in the fraud of the vendor of one of several persons claiming title under a fraudulent bill of sale will prevent a recovery in an action of trover in which all were joined, the rule in such case being that unless all of the plaintiffs are entitled to recovery the verdict must be for the defendant. Pettibone v. Phelps, 13 Conn. 445, 35 Am. Dec. 88 (1840).

A transfer by a debtor to a creditor which is fraudulent and void as having been made and received with intent to defraud creditors, however, does not invalidate a separate assignment to another creditor made at the same time. Crawford v. Neal, 144 U. S. 585, 36 L. ed. 552 (1891).

A grantee under a conveyance made and received with a fraudulent intent cannot acquire title by possession against creditors of the grantor. Beach v. Catlin, 4 Day, 284, 4 Am. Dec. 221 (1810).

(11 Wash. 337.)

1. The exemption of community property from liability for a separate and individual debt of the husband extends to a judgment against him rendered in another state for his individual debt long before the community property was acquired.
2. Property exempt from levy and sale on execution cannot be subjected to the payment of a judgment for a debt incurred in a sister state where the exemption laws are different.

(February 24, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to enjoin a sale of property which had been levied upon under an execution upon a judgment against plaintiff William La Selle. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Shank & Smith, for appellants:

The presumption that the husband's debts are community debts is not limited to debts incurred within this state.

The presumption that a judgment against a husband is for a community debt, and so a charge upon community property, was first recognized in Andrews v. Andrews, 3 Wash. Terr. 289.

If the husband obtained any property by virtue of his exertions it would prima facie at least be the property of the community, and we think it must follow that in his efforts to obtain property it must prima facie be presumed that he acts for the community.

Oregon Imp. Co. v. Sagmeister, 4 Wash. 710, 19 L. R. A. 233; Calhoun v. Leary, 6 Wash. 21.

The presumption that property acquired by either husband or wife during the community is community property was first recognized in Lemon v. Waterman, 2 Wash. Terr. 493.

The presumption as to community property evidently arises generally from the nature of the case, and especially from the statutory definition of community property.

Gen. Stats. §§ 1387–1399; Yesler v. Hochstettler, 4 Wash. 349.

This presumption should not be limited to property accumulated within the state unless only such property can be community property —the presumption should exist wherever the law on which it is based can apply.

Ritchie v. Carpenter, 2 Wash. 512; Freeburger v. Gazzam, 5 Wash. 772.

Whatever the debt may have been called in Wisconsin it was in effect a community debt, and the laws of this state do not undertake to change the status or liability of such a debt merely by its coming across our border.

Andrews v. Andrews, 3 Wash. Terr. 289; Littell & S. Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 3 Wash. 483.

The debt was incurred by La Selle in the course of a business pursued for the common support of himself and his wife. It is in this just the sort of debt which the purpose and scope of the community law unquestionably makes a community debt.

Oregon Imp. Co. v. Sagmeister, 4 Wash. 710, 19 L. R. A. 233; Brotton v. Langert, 1 Wash. 80; Columbia Nat. Bank v. Embree, 2 Wash. 331; Sadler v. Niesz, 5 Wash. 182.

Messrs. Remington & Reynolds, for respondents:

All debts relating to the separate property of either spouse are separate debts unless jointly made; separate debts embrace all debts severally incurred by either spouse that are not made in the acquisition or for the benefit of community property, as well as those incurred by either spouse without the proper authority from the other.

It being evident that property acquired in Wisconsin in incurring this debt for which the Wisconsin judgment was taken was there the separate property of William La Selle, and that it would be so recognized by all the states and nations to which that property might be removed, the appellants, wholly failing to identify the debt with community property, have no standing in court.

Story, Confl. L. 362; Packwood's Succession, 9 Rob. (La.) 438, 41 Am. Dec. 341.

The opinion upon the first hearing was delivered by Hoyt, Ch. J.:

Appellant William F. Collins, in a suit brought in King county against the respondent William La Selle, duly recovered judgment. To this action and judgment the respondent Marian E. La Selle, wife of said William La Selle, was not a party. Execution issued on said judgment, which was placed in the hands of J. H. Woolery, sheriff of King county, the other appellant. He made a levy upon a piece of real estate situated in King county, of which the paper title was in the name of said Marian E. La Selle. This suit was then brought by the respondents, and thereby they sought to enjoin the sale of the property levied upon, and to have it decreed that such property was not subject to the lien of the judgment. It was conceded that the property, though standing in the name of the wife, Marian E. La Selle, was the community property of herself and her husband, William La Selle. It was therefore, under the rule established by numerous decisions of this court, subject to the lien of the judgment against the husband alone, if the debt upon which such judgment was rendered was that of the community. It is equally well established by the adjudications of this court that such property was not subject to the lien of such judgment if the debt for which it was rendered was the separate debt of the husband. It must follow that the nature of the debt which was the foundation of the judgment is the material question to be determined upon this appeal. If it was that of the community, the sheriff should have been allowed to proceed to satisfy the judgment by a sale of the property. If it was the debt of the husband alone, the appellants were rightfully restrained from proceeding further against the property in question. The foundation of this judgment was one against the husband alone, made and entered in the state of Wisconsin, and the foundation of that one was a liability incurred by the husband to the appellant Collins in the prosecution of his business as a contractor and builder, and proprietor of a sash and door factory, and was for materials sold to him to be used in the construction of houses and to supply his factory. At the time this liability was incurred, and the judgment in Wisconsin rendered, the respondents were living together as husband and wife in the state of Wisconsin. Afterwards they removed from said state, and from a time preceding the date of the judgment rendered in King county had been living together as husband and wife in this state. The pleadings on the part of the respective parties enter with much detail into the circumstances surrounding these transactions, and also set up such of the statutes of Wisconsin as to the pleaders seemed necessary to determine the law of that state upon the question of the rights of the husband and wife to property there acquired, and upon the question of its liability for debts contracted by the husband alone.

Before entering upon a discussion of the rights of the respective parties growing out of the law of Wisconsin in relation to the liability of property for the debts of the husband, it is necessary to say a word as to a preliminary question. It has been held that under the laws of this state a debt incurred by the husband alone is prima facie a community debt, and for that reason is enforceable against the community property, unless it is made to appear by allegation and proof that the transaction which gave rise to the liability had no relation to any business of which the community would have been entitled to the benefits. Is such presumption confined to debts incurred in this state? There can be li tle reason for so holding, for while it is true that it will not be presumed that a debt incurred elsewhere could be enforced against community proper y as such, for the reason that in most of the other states property of that kind is unknown, yet it is but reasonable to presume that under the laws of any of the states of this Union the business of the husband, though it may be in form for his own benefit, and relate only to property of which he is the legal owner, is in reality for the benefit of himself and his wife as a family, and that a liability incurred on account thereof is one which affects the substantial interests of the wife as well as the husband. This being so, there would seem to be good reason for holding that the presumption as to the liability of community property for the debts of the husband alone should extend to those incurred outside of as well as within this state. If we should hold this to be the law, it would probably make it unnecessary for us to discuss any other question raised by the briefs, since we are inclined to agree with the contention of the appellants that there is no sufficient allegation in the complaint to overcome the presumption in favor of the judgment. This question is, however, of such an important nature that it should only be decided in an action in which the rights of the parties can only be ascertained by its determination. We shall, therefore, make no further suggestion in relation thereto in this case.

The substantial question presented by the facts is as to the status of the debt which was the foundation of the judgment in Wisconsin in reference to the property of the husband, or the husband and wife, situated in that state. It appears from the statutes set out in the answer that in that state there is no such thing as community property, as understood here, nor is there any such thing as separate property of the husband, as defined by our laws. The wife alone could own separate property, and the provisions in relation to its acquisition were substantially the same, as in this state. All other property was that of the husband, whether it was acquired in such a manner as to make it, under our laws, his separate property, or that of the community. And all of his property, under the laws of that state, could be subjected to the payment of debts incurred by him alone. It will be seen from these provisions that a debt incurred by the husband could there be enforced against all of the property acquired by the husband and wife either before or after marriage, excepting such as, under the laws of that state, would be the separate property of the wife. This is substantially the result of the laws of this state as interpreted by former decisions of this court. In our opinion, the comity which one state owes to another goes to the substance rather than to the form of things. If a certain right is given in one state as to property of a certain nature, comity would require that those rights should be enforced in another state as to property of the same nature, though it might be called by a different name. In the state of Wisconsin, property which was acquired by the joint labors of the husband and wife, though called the property of the husband, was subject to the payment of debts incurred by the husband, in the prosecution of business for the support of the family. Property acquired in the same manner in this state belongs to the community, but is subject to a liability incurred by the husband alone in the prosecution of business for the same object. Hence, under the rule above suggested, comity requires that a debt which under the laws of that state could be enforced against property which, from the nature of its acquisition, would be that of the community in this state, should be here enforced against property belonging to the community. There is nothing in the policy of our legislation which will prevent the application of the rule above stated to the facts of this case. On the contrary, the general policy of this state upon the question of the liability of property of the community and of the respective spouses for debts incurred by the husband alone in the prosecution of any business is in substantially the same line as that of the state of Wisconsin. But whether it is or not, so long as the rights of the parties are adjudicated under the laws of this state, its citizens have no ground of complaint, whatever may be the result as to those of other states. And since what we have said has been founded upon our statute, and the rights adjudicated thereunder have been in the light of the facts shown by the record, the respondents cannot complain. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the affirmative defenses pleaded in the amended answer.

Dunbar, Scott, and Gordon, JJ., concur.

On rehearing Gordon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was heard and decided by this court at the January term, 1895. Respondents' petition for rehearing having been allowed, and the cause reargued, a majority of the court are of the opinion that a wrong conclusion was reached at the former hearing. The case is fully stated in the former opinion, in the course of which opinion the court said, "If a certain right is given in one state as to property of a certain nature, comity would require that those rights should be enforced in another state, as to property of the same nature." Upon further consideration, we think that this is extending the doctrine of comity too far. While comity might require that rights so acquired, against personal property merely, should be enforced in this state, as against such property (Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 289, 3 L. ed. 104; Whart. Confl. L. § 324), we do not think it ought to be extended to property subsequently acquired in this state, although of the "same nature," and this principle is wholly inapplicable to real property. The law of the place where the real property is situated must be held to control its disposition, whether by voluntary or forced sale. McCormick v. Sullivant, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300. Upon this subject no less a writer than Story has said: "All the authorities in both countries [England and America], so far as they go, recognize the principle in its fullest import, that real estate, or immovable property, is exclusively subject to the laws of the government within whose territory it is situate." Story, Confl. Laws, § 428. "Any title or interest in land, or in other real estate, can only be acquired or lost agreeably to the law of the place where the same is situate." Id. § 365. The character of the property, as regards the question of its being the separate property of either of the spouses, or the property of the community consisting of both spouses, or otherwise, is fixed by the law of the state where such property, if real property, is situated. So, too, the character of the debt is determined by the law of the place where it arose. If, by the law of Wisconsin, it was the sole, individual debt of the husband it retained that character here. Its status was fixed by the law of the place of its creation. The debt which the appellants are here seeking to enforce being by the law of Wisconsin, where it arose, merely the separate, individual debt of the husband, enforceable only against his separate, individual property, it follows that the judgment rendered upon that debt cannot be satisfied out of the real property of the community acquired in this state long after the debt arose and judgment was rendered upon it. The doctrine of the common law is that: "In regard to the merits and rights involved in actions, the law of the place where they originated is to govern. . . . But the forms of remedies and the order of judicial proceedings are to be according to the law of the place where the action is instituted, without any regard to the domicil of the parties, the origin of the right, or the country of the act." Story, Confl. L. 8th ed. § 558. The settled rule is that the law of the place where the contract was made must govern in determining the character, construction, and validity of such contract, while the law of the place where suit is instituted upon the contract governs as to "the nature, extent, and form of the remedy; . . . whether arrest of the person or attachment of the property may be allowed; whether a debt is or is not discharged by operation of law, as insolvent laws, or barred by statutes of limitation; rights of set-off; the admissibility and effect of evidence; the modes of proceeding; and the forms of judgment and execution." 2 Abbott, Law Dict. p. 36. In the case of Blanchard v. Russell, 13 Mass. 1, 7 Am. Dec. 106, the supreme court of Massachusetts, speaking by Chief Justice Parker, says: "But the courtesy, comity, or mutual convenience of nations, amongst which commerce has introduced so great an intercourse, has sanctioned the admission and operation of foreign laws relative to contracts; so that it is now a principle generally received, that contracts are to be construed and interpreted according to the laws of the state in which they are made, unless from their tenor, it is perceived that they were entered into with a view to the laws of some other state. . . . The rule does not apply, however, to the process by which a creditor shall attempt to enforce his demand in the courts of a state other than that in which the contract was made. For the remedy must be pursuant to the laws of the state where it is sought; otherwise great irregularity and confusion would be introduced into the form of judicial proceedings." The rule has long been established in this court that the community real property is not liable for the separate or individual debt of the husband (Brotton v. Langert, 1 Wash. 73; Stockand v. Bartlett, 4 Wash. 730); and it would be productive merely of confusion and disorder to limit the application of this rule to those debts only which are contracted within this state. One result of such limitation would be that the court would be required, in every case, to resort to the law of the state where the debt arose, in order to determine what property in that state would be liable for such debt, and then to permit such judgment creditor to have his judgment satisfied out of like property of the judgment debtor in this state, without regard to our own law upon the subject. And it would follow logically from such a rule that property of a judgment debtor which is by our law exempt from levy and sale on execution could be subjected to the payment of a judgment for a debt incurred in some sister state, where the exemption laws were different from our own. All these questions relate to the character and extent of the remedy, and not to the construction or validity of the contract, and they are governed and controlled by the lex fori, and not by the lex loci contractus; and to avoid interminable confusion the distinction must be observed.

For these reasons the order and judgment of the Superior Court will be affirmed.

Scott, Dunbar, and Anders, J.J., concur.

Hoyt, Ch. J. dissenting:

The results which will flow from the rule announced in the foregoing opinion are such as to satisfy me that it cannot be the one required by comity. A husband, residing in a sister state, possessed of ever so much property, which, though the title is vested in him, is held for the benefit of himself and wife, and would, from the manner of its acquisition, be here held to be community property, and was there subject to debts for the benefit of the family, which would here be held to be community debts, can escape the payment of all the debts, which may have been contracted on the faith of the property which he owned, by converting such property into cash, and removing to this state, and investing it in real estate. That the laws of one state should be so construed as to allow a debtor in another possessed of abundant means with which to pay all his creditors, to evade the payment of just debts in this way, does not correspond with my ideas of comity. In my opinion, the conclusion reached upon the former hearing was the correct one, and should be adhered to.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Re Will of Ellen Ann CRAWFORD, Deceased.

J. Adger SMYTH, Exr., etc., of Ellen Ann Crawford, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

(.....S. C.....)

The signature of the name of a subscribing witness to a will is not insufficient because it is written by another such witness in the presence and at the request of the former.

(March 23, 1896.)

APPEAL by the executor of the will of Ellen Ann Crawford, deceased, from a decree of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Charleston County reversing a decree of the Probate Court admitting the will to probate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion and in that of the circuit court, which was as follows:

BUCHANAN, J.:

"Miss Ellen Ann Crawford, a resident of the city of Charleston, but temporarily residing in the city of Columbia, departed this life on the 2d day of February, A. D. 1892, leaving an instrument in writing, purporting to be her last will and testament, bearing date the 26th day of March, 1884. On the 10th day of February, 1892, the petition of J. Adger Smyth was exhibited to the court of probate for Charleston county. Such petition recited, in its second paragraph, 'that in the said last will and testament your petitioner, with others, is appointed executor,' and in the third paragraph, 'Your petitioner prays that the said instrument in writing be now admitted to probate as the last will and testament of the said Ellen A. Crawford, and that letters testamentary be granted to him.' That on said 10th day of February, 1892, the paper was probated and proved in common form by the testimony of Mrs. R. S. Forsythe, and subscribed by her in her own handwriting, and probate granted of the same. On the 29th day of May, 1894, Charlotta Hartnett, a niece of the said Ellen Ann Crawford, deceased, and one of the heirs at law and next of kin, and a person interested to invalidate the said paper as a will, presented her petition to the court of probate, praying that said alleged will be proved in due and solemn form. On the 30th day of May, 1894, Honorable A. G. Magrath, probate judge of Charleston county, directed a notice to J. Adger Smyth, notifying him that Charlotta Hartnett, through her attorneys, Messrs. W. M. Fitch and J. Walker Magrath, required the will to be probated in due and solemn form as required by § 1820 of the General Statutes of (1893) South Carolina, and requiring the said J. Adger Smyth, the executor who had qualified, to prefer a petition praying to be permitted to probate said will in due form. On the 18th day of June, 1894, the petition of J. Adger Smyth was preferred, and, among other things it alleged in the fifth paragraph thereof, that the only persons, in the knowledge of the petitioner, that would have been entitled to distribution of the estate of the deceased, had she died intestate, 'were the nieces of the said Ellen Ann Crawford, to wit: the said Charlotta Hartnett and Wilhelmina Crawford, now known as Wilhelmina Irick.' Whereupon a summons was directed by the probate judge to the said Charlotta Hartnett and Wilhelmina Crawford Irick, requiring them to answer the said petition within twenty days after the service thereof, exclusive of the day of such service. Service was duly acknowledged, and Mr. Fitch represented Charlotta Hartnett, and Mr. S. Dibble appeared as attorney for Wilhelmina Crawford Irick.

"Answers were put in for both Charlotta Hartnett and Wilhelmina Crawford Irick. The answers substantially admitted that the paper had been admitted to probate in common form on the 10th day of February, 1892, but deny that such paper was of any validity, inasmuch as formal execution of the same was not had as required by law, and that the alleged will was not 'subscribed by the witnesses in the manner and form required by law.' On the 15th day of April, 1895, Mr. A. M. Lee, attorney for J. Adger Smyth, gave written notice to the contestant, Charlotta Hartnett, 'that on the annexed affidavit and the record in this proceeding the undersigned will move before his honor, the judge of probate, on Monday, the 22d instant, at 11 A. M., for an order directing that Charlotta Hartnett do pay into court such amount as may be necessary to defray the expenses of the executors in the probate of the will of Ellen A. Crawford in solemn form.' The affidavit annexed set out, among other things, that the entire estate had been distributed; 'that, after the payment of all the debts and specified legacies, the executor, in the due course of administration, had distributed the exact rest and residue of the estate of the various residuary legatees in accordance with the directions of the will, holding, as trustee for several of the minor residuary legatees, their share of the residue, to which they were entitled under the will, until a guardian could be appointed for them, and also a certain sum, already agreed on with the probate court, as its fees and costs for closing the estate; that these amounts in his hands are not assets in his hands as executor, but merely temporarily held in trust for others by him;' 'that there are thus no funds in his hands whatever with which to defray the expenses of proving the will in solemn form;' that it will be necessary for the executor to obtain the presence of the witnesses to the will, one of whom resides in the city of Atlanta, state of Georgia; that the executor in his official capacity is in duty bound to go to other expenses also, and must act through counsel learned in the law in this matter; and that all such expenses he is unable, as executor, to meet and defray. Wherefore he prays that, before the executor be ordered to proceed with the proof of the will in solemn form of law, the said petitioner for the same Charlotta Hartnett be directed to deposit in court, or with the executor, such amounts as may be necessary to defray the costs and expenses of the proceeding The motion was made and refused on the 22d day of April, 1895, after which proof was offered and testimony given for the purpose of proving the alleged will in due and solemn form.

"The evidence disclosed the fact that the signature of the third alleged witness to the will, Mrs. R. S. Forsythe, was made by Mrs. Cosgrove (then Miss M. G. Forsythe), her daughter, at the request of the mother; that Mrs Forsythe, the person whose name appears as that of the third witness, was accustomed to get her writing done by others; she could write whenever she wanted to; she did not touch the pen when her daughter was signing her name. This was admitted by the party in the case; and the sole and only question is, Can one witness subscribe a will for another witness by signing the name of such other witness thereto, without some actual contactual relation between them, and when such witness whose name is being written by proxy can write, and is under no physical inability preventing her from writing her own name in her own handwriting? Can a person be a witness by deputy? It is to be observed that there was no touching of the pen by Mrs. Forsythe while her daughter was writing her name as a witness to the paper. The daughter merely wrote it at the instance of the mother, and upon the part of the mother there was no further participation in the act. Was this a sufficient compliance with our statute which requires a subscription by the witness? In my opinion, it was not. A contrary construction would be a nullification of the very words, and an undermining and sapping of the purpose of the statute, and its validity and efficacy would be emasculated and gone. To say that one witness can 'subscribe' his name by the hand and in the exclusive manual act of another, when such witness can write, is to encourage forgery and put a direct premium upon fraud. To say that under these circumstances there was a compliance would be tantamount to a virtual repeal and a direct impairment of the integrity of the written law,—a relaxation without warrant of authority. I am well aware of the existence of some decisions that appear to make against the contention, but that such difference is more apparent than real an examination in connection with the wording of the various acts, and their application to the particular facts and circumstances of each particular case, will show. Bear in mind that there is no analogy to be drawn from cases where the pen was touched, for here there was no contractual participation whatever, or any reasoning or construction to be drawn from the fact that a testator is allowed to sign by the hand and in the exclusive handwriting of another, for this is permitted by the very words of the act itself. Here the proxy completed the whole of the operation as fully as Mrs. Forsythe could have done herself, and as if it had been done by her alone, one person completing the whole signing of the alleged third witness.

"There is no unanimity in the works of Jarman, Redfield, and Schouler upon the subject, nor is there any harmony in the annotations of such of those works as have been recently edited upon the point. Nor do the cases of Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 265; Welch v. Welch, 9 Rich. L. 133; Wooster v. Wooster, 4 Rich. L. 409; Sampson v. White, 1 McCord, L. 55; Ex parte Leonard, 39 S. C. 522,—throw any light upon the subject. The exact point seems never to have been raised in this state before. The cases mainly relied upon to sustain the execution of the will are Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102; Upchurch v. Upchurch, 16 B. Mon. 102; Montgomery v. Perkins, 2 Met. (Ky.) 448, 74 Am. Dec. 419; Chase v. Kittredge, 11 Allen, 59, 87 Am. Dec. 687; Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 42 Am. Rep. 565; and Re Strong's Will, 3 Connoly, 574. In Jesse v. Parker the witness made his mark. In Montgomery v. Perkins the witness held the pen as the draftsman wrote the names. In Upchurch v. Upchurch the two witnesses whose names were written by Joseph Upchurch could not write, and, even if it were the sound doctrine that where the witness could not write his entire subscription may be made by another for him, this case would be inapplicable here, inasmuch as Mrs. Forsythe could write her name very well, and did subscribe her name very legibly, nearly eight years after, to the affidavit before the judge of probate. In Re Strong's Will there was not only a statute differing from ours, but the witness 'was incapacitated from writing, by reason of a felon on his right hand.' The criticism on Upchurch v. Upchurch is in point. The effect of Lord v. Lord (if the statutes were the same), being put by the court upon the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se, scarcely carries with it any authority. How this maxim can be invoked to sustain an act which is required by law to be done personally, I do not understand. Schouler, Wills, § 339, note 7, expresses disapproval of the views announced in this case. These cases do not justify the contention of the executor, while the other case (Chase v. Kittredge) is directly against the execution of the will, and shows that such paper is of no force or effect. That there were only two witnesses, in contemplation of law, to the paper proposed as a will the following authorities fully maintain: Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 396; Riley v. Riley, 36 Ala. 496; McFarland v. Bush, 94 Tenn. 538, 27 L. R. A. 662; Re McElwaine's Will, 18 N. J. Eq. 499; Re Downie's Will, 42 Wis. 66; Pawtucket v. Ballou, 15 R. I. 58; Meehan v. Rourke, 2 Bradf. 385; Ragland v. Huntingdon, 1 Ired. L. 561. While courts always lean to the support of a will, if the law has been complied with substantially, yet where there is an entire absence of a formal requirement of the act the courts will not hesitate to say so, and declare its total invalidity. Any other construction would be a frittering away of the statute. It is therefore declared that the paper proposed is no will, for lack of compliance with the statute. It is ordered that the appeal from the probate court be sustained, and that the order of that court finding a will be set aside."

* Mr. A. M. Lee, for appellant:

One who appoints a proxy or deputy names a person who is to act in the absence of the principal. But where a party requests an act to be done in his own presence and in his own name, by another, then this other is not acting by deputy or proxy, but his act is the act of the principal himself.

Our courts have shown an evident inclination to carry out the spirit of the statute, and to affirm, if possible, the validity of a will. Hence it has been held that a subscribing witness may sign with his initials, or make his mark, or do anything else which would indicate his presence at the execution of the will.

Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 265; Welch v. Welch, 9 Rich. L. 133; Wooster v. Wooster, 4 Rich. L. 409; 1 Jarman, Wills, 213; 1 Wms. Exrs. & Admrs. 82.

From 1849 down to the present time a series of decisions emanating from courts of the most respectable authority have held that the signature of a witness to a will made for him at his request in his presence by another person is a valid act of his own; inasmuch as it is done by one acting under his authority and as his other self,—his hand, so to speak.

The word "handwriting" as used in this section of the statute requiring proof of handwriting is equivalent to the "signatures" of the parties and used interchangeably.

Mr. Samuel Dibble, for respondent Wilhelmina C. Irick:

The words of the statute are: "Sec. 1988. All wills and testaments of real and personal property shall be in writing and signed by the party executing the same or by some other person in his presence and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of the said testator and of each other by three or more credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void and of none effect."

A distinction is made in this statute between the duties of the testator and the witnesses. The testator may sign himself or expressly direct another to sign for him. No such privilege is mentioned in the statute as pertaining to the subscription of the witnesses. The minimum number of subscribing witnesses requisite is placed at three. The words are "three or more." Dunlap v. Dunlap, 4 Desauss. Eq. 311.

The act of subscription must be the manual act of the witness.

Messrs. William M. Fitch and J. Walker Magrath, for respondent Charlotta Hartnett:

Upon occasion of proving a will in solemn form if it appear to the judge of probate that the witnesses to the will or any of them are dead or insane, proof of the handwriting of the witnesses so dead or insane, and of the handwriting of the testator, shall be admitted by the judge of probate as prima facie evidence that the testator did execute the will in question in the presence of the witnesses thereto.

In determining whether a will was executed in conformity to the statute, courts will not consider the intention of the testator but that of the legislature.

Schouler, Wills, 2d ed. 1892, § 339.

In the United States the doctrine as generally expounded denies, like that of the English cases, that a witness to a will signs or subscribes so as to satisfy the statute without some manual act on his part by way of attestation.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether the will of Ellen A. Crawford, offered for probate in due form of law, was duly attested. The facts in the case are, in the main, undisputed, and are sufficiently set forth in the decree of the judge of probate (which should be incorporated in the report of this case), in which he held that the will was duly attested, and admitted the will to probate. From this decree the parties who, it seems, would have been entitled to recover in case there was no will, appealed to the court of common pleas, and the appeal was heard by his honor Judge Buchanan, who rendered judgment reversing the decree of the judge of probate; and from that judgment J. Adger Smyth, named as executor in the will, appeals to this court, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which, with the judgment of Judge Buchanan, should be incorporated in the report of this case. The only question in the case is whether the fact that one of the persons whose names appear as subscribing witnesses to the will did not in fact write her own name, but requested her daughter, one of the other subscribing witnesses, to write it for her, rendered the attestation by that witness void and of no effect. The undisputed fact is that R. S. Forsythe, whose name appears as one of the subscribing witnesses to the will, appeared before the judge of probate on the 4th day of February, 1892, when the will was offered by the executor for probate in common form, and subscribed her name to the usual affidavit in such cases, in which, among other things, the deponent stated "that she was present and did see the said instrument of writing duly executed by the said Ellen Ann Crawford, . . . and that R. S. Forsythe [the deponent] and M. G. Forsythe and S. W. Forsythe, in the presence of each other and of the said Ellen Ann Crawford, and at her request, signed their names as witnesses to the due execution of the same." For, while one of the grounds of appeal from the decree of the judge of probate imputes error to him "in considering any proof or evidence offered at the proof of the will in common form," it appears from the case that when the testimony as to this matter was offered no objection was interposed; and indeed, as we understand the decree of the judge of probate, he does not base his conclusion upon the fact that the witness R. S. Forsythe made the affidavit above referred to, but merely states that fact as a part of the history of the case. On the contrary, his conclusion is based upon the conceded facts that the name of R. S. Forsythe, as one of the subscribing witnesses to the will, was written by her daughter in her presence and at her request, in the presence and at the suggestion of the testatrix, which he held was a sufficient signing by the said R. S. Forsythe. In this conclusion we fully concur. There can be no question that a will may be duly attested by a witness who, being unable to write his name, makes his mark. This is held even in England. Harrison v. Harrison, 8 Ves. Jr. 185, and Addy v. Grix, Id. 504, which cases have been recognized in this state several times. Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 266; Ray v. Hill, 3 Strobh. L. 303, 49 Am. Dec. 647. Indeed, this proposition does not seem to be contested by counsel in this case. But they contend for the efficiency of an attestation; as, for example, by touching the end of the penstock or penholder while another guides the pen in making the mark. It seems to us that attributing to this useless ceremony of the witness' touching with his finger the end of the penholder while another guides the pen the efficiency claimed for it would be investing a useless form with much more importance than it deserves. What possible security this empty ceremony will afford against fraud, it is impossible to conceive; for the essential fact, as it is claimed, of the touching of the end of the penholder, must necessarily be proved by parol evidence, in order to show the participation of the marksman witness in the act of signing, and why may not the fact that the name of the witness was written by another in his presence, and at his request, be proved by the same kind of evidence? The one affords the same, if not better, protection against fraud than the other. The testimony in this case leaves no doubt of the fact that the names of the three persons selected by the testatrix as witnesses of her will all appear on that paper in the appropriate place; and the fact that the name of one of those witnesses was not written with her own hand, but with the hand of another, at her request and in her presence, seems to us quite as good an attestation as if the mark of such witness had been made by another, she going through the useless ceremony of touching the end of the penholder with her finger while the other guided the pen in making the mark. If the name of a person is signed to a note, receipt, or deed by another, in his presence and at his request, the law would regard it as the act of the person whose name is thus signed. Why? Because, though the physical act of signing is done by another, yet such act having been done in the presence and at the request of the person whose name is there written, it is regarded as his act. Qui facit per alium facit per se. While one partner cannot bind his copartner, ordinarily, by deed, yet if he signs the name of the copartnership to a deed in the presence of his copartners, and with their assent, they are bound. Stroman v. Varn, 19 S. C. 307. Analogy, therefore would lead us to the same conclusion as reasoning from the nature of the case has done.

There being no direct authority in this state, so far as we are informed, upon the precise point which we are called upon to decide, we naturally seek for light from the authorities elsewhere. But those authorities seem to be conflicting, and we must follow those which appear to us to be based upon the better reasoning. Some of the cases which have been cited attach great—and, as we think, undue—importance to the participation by the witness in the mere physical act of signing or making the mark, while other cases, with good reason, as we think, attach but little importance to that circumstance. In Jesse v. Parker, 6 Gratt. 57, 52 Am. Dec. 102, one of the attesting witnesses wrote the names of the other two witnesses, in their presence and at their request, and the court held the attestation good. The court, in delivering its opinion, after saying that it had been settled that a witness may attest a will by making his mark, proceeded as follows: "The validity of such an attestation depends upon the signing of the name of the witness by his authority, and in his presence, and not upon the fact of his making a mark, or doing some manual act in connection with the signature. The making of a mark would furnish little, if any, means of verifying the signature; and the doing of some manual act in connection with the signature would furnish no additional safeguard, appearing on the body of the instrument, against those frauds which it was the object of the statute (29 Car. II.) to prevent." The case of Upchurch v. Upchurch, 16 B. Mon. 102, is to the same effect. So, also, is the case of Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 42 Am. Rep. 565, in which we find this language: "One object of the statute [which, the court had previously said, is copied substantially from that of 29 Car. II.] in requiring an attestation of a will is, to insure identity, and prevent the fraudulent substitution of another document. Another object is, to surround the testator with witnesses to judge of his capacity. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 691; Upchurch v. Upchurch, before cited. And all these purposes are as readily attained in the case where the name of the attesting witness is written by the agent at the request of the principal as where the latter makes his mark, or holds a pen guided by another hand." The same doctrine was held in a comparatively recent case in New York,—Re Strong's Will, 2 Connoly, 574 (decided in 1891),—where the cases of Jesse v. Parker, and Upchurch v. Upchurch were recognized and followed.

It is contended, however, that the doctrine laid down in the cases above cited only applies where the witness whose name is written by another is unable to write, and does not apply to the present case, where the testimony shows that the witness was able to write. We can see no reason whatever for such a limitation of the doctrine, especially where it appears that the witness was at the time temporarily incapacitated from writing. Indeed, in the case last cited (Re Strong's Will) the doctrine was applied where the witness was only temporarily incapacitated from writing "by reason of a felon on her hand." In a California case [96 Cal. 598]—Re Guilfoyle's Will,—which we find reported in 22 L. R. A. 370, with full and instructive notes,—we find the following language, which is very pertinent to the point: "Persons who know how to write may become physically incapable of writing their names by reason of rheumatism, or paralysis of the hands, and other causes besides general physical debility, though of sound mind; and it seems unreasonable that the legislature intended to exclude all such persons from the privilege of subscribing a will or other instrument by a mark. The language of the Code is, 'when the person cannot write.' This fairly includes all persons who are unable to write from any cause, even though they know how to write." In this case the judge of probate finds, as a matter of fact (and there is no exception to this finding), "that Mrs. Forsythe was aged and very nervous, and wrote with such difficulty that her almost universal custom was to have her daughter, Miss Forsythe, sign all papers for her, and do all her writing; and for this reason, and in accordance with this habit, she requested her daughter to sign her name to the will as a witness on this occasion." Accordingly the daughter did sign her name in her presence, and in the presence of the testatrix and the other subscribing witnesses; Mrs. Forsythe, as the testimony shows, leaning over her at the time, and thus practically participating in the physical act of signing, if that were necessary. The fact that Mrs. Forsythe was able to sign her own name to the affidavit which she made for proof of the will in common form cannot affect the question, for the obvious reason that such affidavit was made about eight years after the execution of the will,—long after she had been relieved from the causes which produced the extreme nervousness from which she was suffering at the time the will was executed. The circuit judge seems to have fallen into an error in supposing that the cases upon which we rely were based upon statutes differing from ours. An examination of those cases will show that the statutes there considered were substantially the same as ours, so far as the question here involved is concerned. So, too, his remark as to signing by proxy is misleading, for that implies that the agent or proxy signs in the absence of the principal, while here the conceded fact is that the name of Mrs. Forsythe was written by her daughter in her presence, and at her request.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the decree of the judge of probate be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Lorraine W. DE LA MONTANYA, Respt.,
v.
James DE LA MONTANYA, Jr., Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Constructive service of summons cannot give jurisdiction in a divorce suit to award alimony and the exclusive custody of the children where the defendant and the children are outside of the state and do not appear, even if their domicil is within the state.

2. A motion to vacate a judgment rendered without jurisdiction may be made without the defendant's submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court or showing a meritorious defense, as required in cases under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

3. An appeal from an order refusing to set aside a judgment rendered without jurisdiction will not be denied on the ground that the judgment was appealable.

(McFarland and Van Fleet, JJ., and Beatty, Ch. J., dissent.)

(March 24, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order denying his motion to vacate that portion of a judgment which had been entered against him in a divorce proceeding which granted the plaintiff alimony and the custody of the minor children. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dorn & Dorn, for appellant:

The judgment, in so far as it relates to any matter except the divorce, and so far as it relates to the custody of children and alimony, is void.

As soon as a citizen of the state crosses its border, intending not to return, its courts lose then their jurisdiction over his person, and cannot, by any subsequent service of process, acquire the power to render a judgment against him which will bind him personally in another state.

1 Freem. Judgm. 4th ed. § 330; Bouchaud v. Dias, 3 Denio, 243; Francis v. Wood, 81 Ky. 16.

Temple, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to obtain a divorce, in which the plaintiff also asked for the exclusive custody and control of two children, the issue of the marriage, and also for permanent alimony, as well as for a suitable allowance to enable her to prosecute this action. The defendant and the children, who were, of course, infants, were absent from the state when the suit was commenced, and have ever since remained absent. No personal service of the summons was had on the defendant, and he did not appear in the action. An attempt was made to serve the summons by publication. It is claimed that the service was void because not made as required by the laws of this state, but I shall assume that such attempt at a constructive service was in accordance with the statute in every respect. The defendant was born, and during his whole life had lived, in this state. He left the state on the 20th day of November, 1893, with two children of plaintiff and defendant, proceeding to New York, and on the 9th day of December, 1893, left New York for Paris, France, where he arrived with his children on the 19th day of December. January 4, 1894, he made application to the ministry of justice of France for express permission to be domiciled in France. Such permission was granted on the 14th day of July, 1894. Since December 19, 1893, defendant has resided in France with his children, and neither he nor either of the children have since been within the state. This suit was commenced two days after the departure of the defendant from the state, and it is claimed that defendant left the state and took the children for the express purpose of evading the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. As stated, the defendant did not appear in said action, and, the publication of summons having been made, in due time the default of the defendant was entered, and the court proceeded to hear the cause; and on the 16th day of May, 1894, judgment was rendered against defendant, wherein it was adjudged (1) that the marriage be dissolved; (2) that the exclusive custody, care, and control and education of the children be awarded to plaintiff; and (3) that plaintiff "shall have the right, at such time in the future as she shall be advised, to apply to the court for such suitable allowance and sum to be paid her by said defendant for her support during her life, and such further sums as may be necessary in order to enable her to make proper compensation to her attorneys and counsel in said action, and to enforce this decree and judgment. On the 7th day of September, 1894, on due notice, the defendant moved the court for an order (1) vacating the judgment in so far as the same relates to alimony, or any provision for the support of plaintiff, or for the support of the children of plaintiff and defendant; (2) vacating the judgment so far as it relates to the care, custody, and control of the children; (3) vacating the judgment so far as it relates to alimony, or allowance for the support of plaintiff or the children,—and for an order striking out from the judgment all the provisions relating to or providing for alimony, or support for the plaintiff or the minor children of plaintiff and defendant, or awarding or providing for the custody, care, or control of the said two minor children. The motion was based upon the claim that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this action, in so far as it relates to the matters, subjects, and things hereinbefore specified, and had no jurisdiction or power or authority to make any order or judgment in relation to the subject-matters and things aforesaid, and had no jurisdiction over the person of the defendant sufficient to enable, authorize, or empower it to make any order, judgment, or provision in relation to said subject-matters and things, and that said defendant was at the time of the commencement of this action, and ever since has been, and now is, without the jurisdiction of the said court, and without the territorial limits of the state of California, and has never been served with process herein personally, and no service of process has been had herein to enable the court to make any order, judgment, or provision in regard to the subjects, matters, and things aforesaid, and that said infant children of plaintiff and defendant were not at the time of the commencement of this action, and never since have been, and are not now, within the state of California. In support of the motion, various affidavits were read, showing the above facts and others.

Appellant here bases his claim for reversal upon three grounds: First, that the proof of publication shows that constructive service has never been had according to the statutes of this state, and that, therefore, the judgment is wholly void; second, the defendant and children were at the time of the attempted service of summons domiciled in France, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to award the custody of the children to plaintiff, or to provide for alimony; and third, that the mere fact that the defendant and children were without the territorial limits of California when the action was commenced deprives the court of jurisdiction, even admitting that defendant and the children are domiciled in California, and the constructive service of summons was in all respects regular. Respondent admits the facts in regard to the departure of defendant from the state with the children, but claims that, as matter of law and fact, it appears that the domicil of the defendant and children is, and has always been in California; and she contends that, such being the case, the court acquired jurisdiction, not only to grant the divorce to her, but to enter a judgment in personam against the defendant, valid at least in California. She also contends that the judgment awarding to plaintiff the custody of the children is in rem; that it is valid, because it is a mere incident to the divorce; and that, upon a dissolution of the marriage, it was necessary to provide for the children. Furthermore, she insists that there is no judgment for alimony, or for an allowance of any kind.

Conceding that the defendant and the children are all domiciled in California, although in fact absent from the state at the time of the commencement of the action and since, and that the constructive service of summons was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to grant the divorce, did the court have the power to award to plaintiff the exclusive custody of the children, and to allow alimony? I have concluded that it had no such power. Some cases are cited which seem to hold that a personal judgment obtained by constructive service of the summons is valid within the state, although the defendant may have been in fact absent from the state at the time of such service. As to most of these cases, it may be said that such statements are entirely obiter, the question before the court being as to the extraterritorial effect of such judgment. In such cases the argument is, in general, that, conceding the validity of the judgment within the state where rendered, another state will not recognize its validity, because it will not permit the process of another state to be served within its territory, so as to compel one resident there, or in fact being there, to answer a writ issued by the courts of such foreign state. It is a sort of an invasion of a state to serve a foreign writ there at all. The logic would require the courts to go further, and hold that such judgment is wholly void. Constructive service upon a party who is within the state does not raise the question. The question there is simply whether a defendant had such reasonable opportunity to be heard as will constitute due process. The leading case upon subjects of this character is Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. Counsel for respondent contends that it is not there held that jurisdiction to enter a personal judgment cannot be obtained over one domiciled in the state by constructive service, when such defendant is absent from the state at the time of the attempted service, but only that such service is not good against a defendant who is not only without the state, but is actually domiciled elsewhere. Domicil has never, so far as I am aware, been made the test of jurisdiction to render a personal judgment. The question there is always whether there has been due process,—whether the defendant has had a reasonable opportunity to be heard. Substituted service may be valid upon those within the state when the same service would be void as to those without the state. As to those within the state, the question would be whether it has afforded a defendant a reasonable opportunity to be heard. But the process cannot go beyond the state, and compel any person in another state to resort to the state where the action is pending, there to make his defense. No service will be recognized, made there, whether actual or constructive. It is as much an invasion of a foreign jurisdiction to serve a citizen of the state in which the action was brought, temporarily resident there, as it would be to summon from its borders a citizen of such foreign state. If such things could be done, who would determine where the domicil of a particular person really was? Domicil often depends upon secret intention. It would be a most unsatisfactory test. I am aware that it is often said by courts and law writers that domicil is the test of jurisdiction in divorce. This doctrine was built up mainly, if not entirely, to prevent parties really residing in a state from going to another for the purpose of getting a divorce. So far, its effect has been beneficent; but it is obvious, after all, that what in these cases is called domicil is not domicil. As between states, it would be no test at all, unless it is domicil as defined in international law. To concede that each state may give a different definition, or to speak of domicil for the purposes of divorce, as is often done, is to concede that the test is not domicil. These writers and the courts say the test is "actual, bona fide domicil." Since every person always has a domicil, and can have but one, how does "actual and bona fide domicil" differ from "domicil?" It is meant, I presume that domicil and actual residence must coincide. Where, then, is the jurisdiction in those cases where they do not? One may be domiciled in California who never was within the state, and never had thought of going there. Or he may be domiciled therein years after he has left without the intention of returning. Persons have in California exercised for years all the rights of citizens, and even held high office, who according to Phillimore, Jacobs, Dicey, and other writers on the law of domicil, never had a domicil here, because they at all times had a fixed and definite intention of returning to their domicil of origin. Had the wife of such a person obtained a divorce while he was here exercising the rights of a citizen of the state, would the courts of any state declare such a decree void upon proof of the existence of such intention? If, not, then domicil is not the test of jurisdiction, even as to the status of the litigants, and certainly not in personal actions. Jurisdiction is derived from the Constitution and laws creating the court, and I know of no limitation in the Constitution of the United States upon the power of a state to give to its courts jurisdiction over all persons found within its borders. Certainly it has not imposed any such limitation as the test of domicil. Domi-cil is the test of personal rights in regard to inheritance, but, unless made so by local law, is not important as affecting the relation of the individual to the government. The relation of the individual to the government depends upon actual presence within the territorial limits of a country, and upon citizenship or allegiance.

But I cannot understand Pennoyer v. Neff as counsel do. It is true that, in the case in which the judgment there under consideration was rendered, the defendant was said to have been a nonresident, and presumably was domiciled abroad, but that circumstance seems to have been treated as one immaterial in the discussion. The judgment there was personal, and jurisdiction was obtained, if at all, by constructive service of summons. I use the term "constructive service" for convenience, although it does not constitute service at all when the defendant is without the state. No property has been attached. The conclusion is based upon a proposition of international law laid down at the outset: "No state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. Story, Confl. L. chap. 2; Wheaton, International Law, pt. 2, chap. 2. The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity, and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject persons or property to its decisions." The idea seems to be that the state has no jurisdiction over either persons or property not within its territory and that to allow it to summon one from another state is an encroachment upon the independence of such state. The judge then cites the case of Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931. In that case Justice Miller was considering a judgment obtained by W. G. Brownlow against Reynolds and others for false imprisonment. Brownlow made affidavit to the effect that the defendants had fled from the state, or so absconded or concealed themselves that the ordinary process of law could not reach them. Thereupon, under the statutes of Tennessee, the plaintiff caused an attachment to be issued, and due publication to be made. Default was entered, and a judgment, personal in form, against defendants. The land attached was sold, and the case before the court was ejectment, brought by the original owner against the purchaser under the judgment, who had taken possession. The question was as to the validity and effect of the judgment. The court proceeded to state that the proceeding, in case the defendant did not appear, was strictly in rem; that if he appeared, it then became in personam. It was there said: "That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases is clearly evinced by two well established propositions: First, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in the suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted. No suit can be maintained on such a judgment in the same court or in any other, nor can it be used as evidence in any other proceeding not affecting the attached property, nor could the costs in that proceeding be collected of defendant out of any other property than that attached in the suit." After making a quotation which includes the above, Judge Field proceeds: "The fact that the defendants in that case had fled from the state, or had concealed themselves, so as not to be reached by the ordinary process of the court, and were not nonresidents, was not made a point in the decision. The opinion treated them as being without the territorial jurisdiction of the court; and the grounds and extent of its authority over persons and property thus situated were considered, when they were not brought within its jurisdiction by personal service or voluntary appearance." The judge then proceeds to add that to the doctrine stated in the citation all the judges of the court agree. I understand this to be a deliberate statement to the effect that domicil and residence, or both, are immaterial, as, indeed, they must be, if, as appears all through the opinion, the basis of the doctrine is that process cannot run beyond the limits of the state. I might make further quotations from this opinion, but it is too familiar to the profession to require it. An impartial consideration of the opinion will, I think, convince any one that it holds that process cannot be served upon anyone without the state. And the same doctrine is announced in Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959, where it is said: Whenever, therefore, it appears from the inspection of the record of a court of general jurisdiction that the defendant, against whom a personal judgment or decree is rendered, was, at the time of the alleged service, without the territorial limits of the court, and thus beyond the reach of its process,—that he never appeared in the action,—the presumption of jurisdiction over his person ceases." From this, and other like expressions in other cases, it is manifest that domicil or even residence in a state cuts no figure at all. The idea that domicil determines jurisdiction in divorce rests upon the assumption that status depends upon domicil, and is of interest there only. Judge Field could not have had this in mind in Pennoyer v. Neff, and, therefore, when he speaks of "absent defendants," he cannot mean those not domiciled within the state, but must have meant simply those physically absent, and upon whom, therefore, personal service of process could not be made. But it is claimed that the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was explained in Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 670, in accordance with the views of respondent. I cannot find anything in that case upon the subject. The judgment there under consideration was a judgment by confession entered by a prothonotary in a court of Pennsylvania, in pursuance, as it was claimed, of a bond and warrant of attorney executed by John Benge, who was then a resident and citizen of Maryland. The warrant of attorney authorized any attorney of any court of record to confess judgment against him. The statute of Pennsylvania authorized the prothonotary of any court of record in the state to enter judgment upon such an instrument. An attempt was made to execute this judgment in Maryland. It was claimed that the judgment was void, not being entered in pursuance of the power, and that defendant not having been served with process, and not having appeared, the judgment was without jurisdiction and void. The numerous cases cited by the chief justice were used to show that such a judgment would be held invalid without the state where rendered, and not to show that it should be held valid within the state; and I think the question whether such a judgment would be valid within the state where rendered was not before the court in any of the cited cases. But, in discussing the question as to whether the judgment would be valid in another state, it was assumed that it might be valid within the state where rendered. That was the very question in Pennoyer v. Neff. A personal judgment upon constructive service had been rendered against a nonresident, and property in Oregon sold under execution to satisfy it. The question was as to the validity of the judgment within the state where rendered.

It is contended also by the respondent that the decree is valid as to children and alimony, although the service was constructive, and the court could not render a personal judgment because these are incidents to the divorce. Conceding that they are incidents to the cause of action for a divorce, the result would not follow. In proceedings in rem, where there is no jurisdiction of the person, no such result has ever been recognized. In Cooper v. Reynolds, supra, it was said that costs cannot be recovered from any other property of defendant. There is, in reality, no defendant save the res. So here it cannot properly be said there was a defendant. In the proceeding the court had before it only the status of the plaintiff. The summons was not really a writ to bring the defendant into court, but merely a notice prescribed by the statute in the interest of fairness, and to rebut the idea that the proceeding was secret. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 159. It brought the res into court, and not the defendant. The adjudication must be confined to that status. It is said that the relation of the parents to the children, and their relation to each other in regard to the children, is a status If so, it would not help the respondent, for no such status was before the court. But the very meaning of the word "status," both derivative and as defined in legal proceedings, forbids that it should be applied to a mere relation. "Status" implies relations, undoubtedly, but it is not a mere relation. But the authorities are all one way on the subject. If the children are within the jurisdiction, and the defendant is personally served with summons, and perhaps if he is not, the court may award the custody of the children to one of them. It is a mode of appointing a guardian, which is always a matter of local control, regardless of the legal domicil of the children, if domicil and residence do not coincide. It seems to have been held that, when the defendant appears and makes issue upon the point, the court may determine that one spouse is a suitable person to have the custody and control of the children, and that the other is not. People, Allen, v. Allen, 40 Hun, 611. An appeal was taken from the order made in that case, which was a proceeding in habeas corpus, to the court of appeals. There the appeal was discharged because it appeared that the lower court, "in view of all the existing facts relating to the welfare and interests of the infants, exercised its discretion in awarding to the mother the custody of the children, and, in so doing, it gave to the Illinois decree, not the force of an estoppel, or the conclusive effect sometimes due to a judgment, but simply regarded it as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the discretion to be exercised, without dictating or controlling it." This seems to hold that, without the state, such a finding would have no binding force. But, where, as in this case, no personal judgment could be entered, there can be no question. Van Vleet, Collateral Attack, §§ 389, 391, and authorities cited. And Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 499, says: "The publication which is permitted by the statute is sufficient to justify a decree in these cases changing the status of the complaining party, and thereby terminating the marriage; and it might be sufficient also to empower the court to pass upon the question of the custody and control of the children of the marriage, if they were then within its jurisdiction. But a decree on this subject would only be absolutely binding on the parties while the children remained within the jurisdiction; if they acquire a domicil in another state or country, the judicial tribunals of that state or country would have authority to determine the question of their guardianship there. But in divorce cases, no more than in any other, can the court make a decree for the payment of money by a defendant not served with process, and not appearing in the case, which shall be binding upon him personally. It must follow, in such a case, that the wife, when complainant, cannot obtain a valid decree for alimony, nor a valid judgment for costs. . . . The remedy of the complainant must generally, in these cases, be confined to a dissolution of the marriage, with the incidental benefits springing therefrom, and to an order for the custody of the children, if within the state." See also Freem. Judgm. §§ 584, 585; Brown, Jur. §§ 6, 8, 78, 79. The doctrine is very clearly stated in Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321: "Every sovereignty exercises the right of determining the status or condition of persons found within its jurisdiction. The laws of a foreign state cannot be permitted to intervene to affect the personal rights or privileges even of their own citizens, while they are residing on the territory and within the jurisdiction of an independent government."

Respondent contends that there is no judgment for alimony. If so, it is not apparent how plaintiff would be injured by striking from the decree the clause complained of. I think the decree, if valid, settles the right of plaintiff to alimony for her support during life, and, as the court had no jurisdiction to provide for alimony, that part of the decree should be stricken out.

Respondent contends that a motion to vacate the judgment in this case could only be maintained under § 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The point of the contention, as I understand it, is that defendant should come in and submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, show a meritorious defense, and ask leave to have his defense considered. It is obvious, of course, that defendant cannot do this; for he cannot show that the judgment was taken against him by his inadvertence, mistake, or excusable neglect. The argument, therefore, is that no such motion will lie. No authority for such a proposition is cited, unless Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, may be claimed to have that effect. In that case, however, the motion was to vacate a judgment rendered because a demurrer was sustained to a complaint, and the plaintiff failed to amend within the time allowed. The motion was made eleven months after the entry of judgment. Plaintiff was not notified, as the Code requires, of the order sustaining the demurrer. If this case is not put upon the ground that the failure to give the notice was not jurisdictional, I think it was overruled by Norton v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 97 Cal. 388, and 394. It was, however, but a default, and the parties were in court. A plaintiff who for six months should fail to know what had become of a demurrer which had been submitted for decision would be guilty of great negligence. The remedy offered by § 473 was ample. The case of Norton v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. seems in point here.

It is also claimed that no appeal lies to this court from an order refusing to set aside the judgment, because the judgment was appealable. To this proposition many decisions of this court are cited. I do not care to review these cases. No doubt it has been held—and, I think correctly—that, when a motion is made to vacate an order under such circumstances that it merely calls upon the court to repeat or overrule the former ruling on the same facts, the last order is not appealable,—not because the last order is not within the terms of § 963 of the Code, allowing appeals, for it may be, but because it would be virtually allowing two appeals from the same ruling, and would, in some cases, have the effect of extending the time for appealing, contrary to the intent of the statute. Nor will such practice be allowed merely to permit a litigant to take an exception, or get a bill of exceptions, which he has neglected to do at the proper time. But I see no reason why this appeal should not be entertained. It is plainly within the terms of the statute allowing appeals, and no other method is suggested in which the right of the appellant to the relief sought could be considered here. An appeal upon the judgment roll would not present all the facts upon which the motion is based, even if one may have a bill of exceptions when he has not been in court and has taken no exceptions. Besides, it is a case in which it was eminently proper, if not necessary, that relief should first be asked from the trial court. Its action could not have been asked in any other mode. The defendant was not in court, and had no opportunity to be heard.

The order is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to grant appellant's motion.

McFarland, J.:

I dissent. This is an action of divorce, and the present appeal is by defendant from an order of the superior court denying his motion to strike from the judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff all the provisions thereof relating to the custody of the minor children of the parties, and to support by way of alimony. The facts of the case are these: The respondent and appellant were both born in, and are citizens of, the state of California. They were married and their children were born, in this state, and they have been continuously domiciled, and resident here. The parties have two children,—a girl named Lorraine, about five years old at the commencement of this action, and a boy named James Francis, about two years old at that time. This action was commenced December 20, 1893. About three weeks before that time, appellant, by force and fraud, took the child James Francis away from respondent, and, on the following day, took and carried away both of said children, and kept them secreted from respondent, and has never since let her see them; and, a short time before the commencement of this action, he clandestinely left the state of California, and took said children with him; and about November 27, 1893, he clandestinely left the United States, taking said children with him, and since then has temporarily sojourned in the city of Paris, in France. In January, 1894, he made application to the proper authorities of France for permission to be domiciled there; and it is admitted by respondent that he obtained such permission in July, 1894. But it appears by the preponderance of evidence that he claimed his legal residence and domicil to be in the city of San Francisco, Cal.; that "his purpose in applying for permission to fix his domicil in France was to prevent his wife from serving summons on him in an action for divorce which she had commenced, and also to keep her from getting possession of the children;" that his sojourning in France was only temporary, for the purposes above mentioned; and that his intention was and is to return to California, where all his interests are, as soon as these purposes shall be subserved. Service of summons was duly made upon him by publication, and sending him a copy of complaint and summons to Paris, France, in accordance with the provisions of the statute of California on that subject; and, default having been regularly entered against him, judgment, after the introduction of evidence, was duly entered in favor of respondent. By said judgment (1) a divorce was granted respondent upon the grounds of adultery and extreme cruelty of appellant; (2) the custody of the said two children was given to respondent; and (3) it was further ordered that respondent "shall have the right, at such time in the future as she shall be advised, to apply to the court for suitable allowance and sum to be paid to her by said defendant for her support during life," etc., as she may be entitled to under her complaint. The motion made by appellant, from the refusal of which this appeal is taken, was to strike out the said second and third parts of said judgment, upon the ground that the said service of summons did not give the court jurisdiction over the matters embraced in those parts of the judgment.

Waiving the objection of respondent that said motion was not a proper remedy under our system of practice, it is apparent that the motion could be granted only upon the theory that the judgment, so far as it embraces the parts sought to be stricken out, is void; absolutely void; void in the state where it was rendered. And a court should certainly not judicially declare such utter inefficiency of a sovereign state to deal with the property and personal rights of its own citizens, unless it be driven to such declaration by the force of inevitable judicial authority. I do not think that there is such authority. The case chiefly relied on is Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, which is declared by counsel for appellant, and by others, to have established what is called the "modern" doctrine in regard to the jurisdiction of state courts over persons not personally served with process within the state. A close examination of that case shows, however, that the main proposition decided by it—which may, perhaps, be styled "modern"—is that a judgment in personam rendered in a state court against a nonresident upon substituted service cannot be enforced even in the state where it was rendered, or satisfied even out of property situated within the state where it was rendered, while, before that, the weight of authority was that, although the courts of another state would not recognize such a judgment, it was valid in the state where it was rendered, and could be satisfied out of property of the defendant situated within that state. This is evidently the view of that case taken by Mr. Freeman, for in his work on Judgments (§ 567) he says: "Until a comparatively recent date, the opinion extensively prevailed that judgments in personam entered after constructive service of process upon a nonresident, while they were not enforceable beyond the limits of the state where entered, were nevertheless so far valid in that state, as to support a sale of the debtor's property situate therein. This opinion has been overthrown by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, supra. Many of the authorities which show that such was the former doctrine may be found in the cases cited in the briefs, and in the opinion of the court in Weaver v. Boggs, 38 Md. 255. In that case the court states the rule in this language: "It is well settled that a judgment obtained in a court of one state cannot be enforced in the courts and against a citizen of another unless the court rendering the judgment has acquired jurisdiction over the defendant by actual service of process upon him, or by his voluntary appearance to the suit, and submission to that jurisdiction. Such a judgment may be perfectly valid in the jurisdiction where rendered, and enforced there, even against the property, effects, and credits of a nonresident defendant there situated, but it cannot be enforced or made the foundation of an action in another state. A law which substitutes constructive for actual notice is binding upon persons domiciled within the state where such law prevails, and as respects the property of others there situated, but can bind neither person nor property beyond its limits." (The italics are ours.) And in Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 670, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of the states of Pennsylvania and Maryland, says: "And the distinction between the validity of a judgment rendered in one state, under its local laws upon the subject, and its validity in another state, is recognized by the highest tribunals of each of these states."

But whether or not the state of the law on the question determined by Pennoyer v. Neff was the same before as after that decision it is apparent that Pennoyer v. Neff did not determine the question involved in the case at bar. There Neff was a bona fide, actual nonresident. The facts of that case were that one Mitchell recovered in a state court of Oregon a personal judgment for professional services against Neff, who was a nonresident of that state, and resided in the state of California; that the service of summons upon Neff was by publication; that on a common execution issued upon that judgment, certain land of Neff, situated in Oregon, was sold to Pennoyer; and that Neff brought an action against Pennoyer to recover said land, and recovered upon the ground that the judgment was not valid, even in Oregon, and could not be satisfied out of land in Oregon, because substituted service would not support a judgment against a nonresident. There was no claim that the defendant had either residence or domicil in Oregon. In that case the fact was that Neff was, in every sense, a nonresident of Oregon, having his domicil and citizenship elsewhere; and the scope of judicial decision is limited by the facts upon which it is based. In the second place, however difficult it may be to accurately define "residence," in its legal signification, and to distinguish it from "domicil," it is apparent that in the opinion in Pennoyer v. Neff the word "nonresident" is used as expressing the fact of an actual, bona fide residence outside of the state where the judgment is rendered,—such a residence as usually accompanies domicil, and not a mere temporary flight from one's home, in fraudem legis. Indeed, throughout the opinion the words "residence" and "domicil" are used indiscriminately, and as synonymous. There was no necessity in that case to notice any distinction, if there be any, between the words; for Neff was a nonresident, in every sense, either of residence or domicil, and the opinion is to be taken as written in view of that fact. For instance, it is said in the opinion that "the plaintiff here was a nonresident of the state;" again, it is said that there cannot be an encroachment upon the independence of the state "in which the persons are domiciled;" again, it is said that "the state, through its tribunals, may compel persons domiciled within its limits to execute," etc.; again, it is said that property within a state, owned by "nonresidents," may be subjected to certain processes, and that this "in no respect infringes upon the sovereignty of the state where the owners are domiciled;" again, "process from tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory and respond to proceedings against them;" and finally the court, in the last sentence of its opinion, says: "The question here respects only the validity of a money judgment rendered in one state, in an action upon a simple contract against the resident of another, without service of process upon him, or his appearance therein." And as, in the case at bar, the appellant was neither a nonresident of the state where the judgment was rendered nor domiciled elsewhere, as was the plaintiff in Pennoyer v. Neff, the latter case cannot be relied on as imperative authority for holding that the power of the state of California to control and preserve, through her tribunals, the personal and property rights of her own citizens, can be evaded by flight perpetrated for that express purpose. As to the reasons sometimes given for an opposite rule, how can the dangers of judgments upon substituted service against persons who might not have seen the publication be marshaled in aid of a party who, knowing of the coming suit, flees to avoid it? In Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931, no question was raised as to the validity of the asserted nonresidence of Reynolds.

That the laws of a sovereign are binding upon all its citizens domiciled within its borders, whether temporarily absent or not, seems to be the clear result of the authorities. "The laws of a sovereign rightfully extend over persons who are domiciled within his terrritory." Story, Confl. L. § 539. Freeman—although he also includes the extraterritorial effect of a judgment, which does not concern us here—sums up the result of the authorities as follows [§ 570]: "The position, however, which seems to be best sustained, both by reason and by precedents, is, that each state has the authority to provide the means by which its own citizens may be brought before its courts; that the courts of other states have no authority to disregard the means thus provided; and finally, that every judgment or decree obtained in a state against some of its citizens, by virtue of a lawful, though constructive, service of process, should be as obligatory upon such citizen in every other state as it is in the state whence it is taken. Nor is it destructive of the extraterritorial effect of a judgment based on constructive service, that the defendant, being a citizen of the state, was temporarily absent therefrom. It is sufficient that he was, at the time, subject to the laws of the state and to the territorial authority of the court." There are numerous judicial decisions to the same point, one or two of which we will notice: In Henderson v. Staniford, 105 Mass. 504, 7 Am. Rep. 551, the court says: "The defendant was not in California when the action was commenced against him there; nor at any time during its pendency. No service of process or notice was ever made upon him personally. He did not appear by counsel, or otherwise, nor assent to the judgment, which was rendered upon his default of appearance. But he had been for a long time before that, a citizen of California; the contract was made there; and that continued to be his legal domicil when the judgment was rendered. He was therefore, upon principles of international right, subject to the laws and to the jurisdiction of the courts of that state." In Welch v. Sykes, 8 Ill. 201, 44 Am. Dec. 689, the supreme court of Illinois declared that "it is competent for each state to prescribe the mode of bringing parties before its courts," and that, "although its regulations in this respect can have no extraterritorial operation, they are nevertheless binding on its own citizens." In Beard v. Beard, 21 Ind. 321, the question is quite exhaustively considered, and many authorities examined, and the general conclusion is that "notwithstanding a state may authorize its courts to render personal judgment, upon constructive notice, against its citizens, it cannot, as we think, authorize such a judgment, upon such notice, against a citizen of another state, resident in such other state." But the statute there did not provide for service by publication, and the court says: "In such a case (that is, of temporary absence of a resident of the state), notice must be given by leaving a copy of process at his last place of residence. In Burnam v. Com. 1 Duv. 211, the court of appeals of Kentucky, considering a statute which provided for substituted service, said: "We cannot adjudge any provision in the act to be unconstitutional. As in other cases, when actual notice cannot be given to absent defendants, there must either be no remedy, or constructive notice must be substituted as sufficient; and what constructive notice shall be given is a question of legislative discretion rather than a power." In that case the defendants were presumably citizens and residents of the state, although temporarily absent. In Huntley v. Baker, 33 Hun, 578, the action was upon a money judgment rendered against the defendant in the state of Wisconsin, upon substituted service, when the defendant, who had lived for a long time in Wisconsin, was absent from that state, and in fact he never returned to it. The court, after referring to the doctrine that there is generally no extraterritorial jurisdiction, says: "But it has been repeatedly held in England that this doctrine is not applicable when the person so sought to be charged by judgment is a subject or citizen of the country where and at the time the proceedings are taken, and when they are in conformity to the statute there, although the person be then absent from the country, and that is put upon the ground that the person domiciled there owes allegiance to the country, and submission to its laws." It is then stated that there are not many reported cases on the point in this country, but reference is made to cases in the United States Supreme Court, and in the court of appeals of New York where the English cases are cited with approval. The court then says: "Without stating the principle more at length, it may be assumed that by reason of the relation between the state and its citizen, which affords protection to him and his property, and imposes upon him duties as such, he may be charged by judgment in personam binding on him everywhere as the result of legal proceedings instituted and carried on in conformity to the statute of the state, prescribing a method of service which is not personal, and which in fact may not become actual notice to him. And this may be accomplished in his lawful absence from the state." The court then states that it is not necessary to consider the distinction between domicil and residence, but that such question was "one of fact dependent upon all the circumstances appearing by and inferable from the testimony, to which it is unnecessary here to refer in detail," which justified the referee to conclude that the domicil or residence of the defendant had not been changed. And the evidence in that case was vastly stronger in favor of a permanent change of residence and domicil than in the case at bar. There are many other authorities to the same point, but we will only refer, in addition to those above cited, to Black on Judgments, § 907, and the numerous cases cited and quoted from in the notes to Flint River S. B. Co. v. Foster, to be found in 48 Am. Dec. commencing at page 274.

In nearly all the cases on the subject the words "resident," "domicil," "citizen," and "inhabitant" are used indiscriminately to signify an actual, permanent residence, which has not been actually and in good faith changed; and "nonresident" is applied to one who is not such a citizen, inhabitant, or resident of, and has not such domicil within, the state in which the judgment is rendered. We are not concerned here with the question how far full faith and credit should be given to the judgment in another state, but only with the question, is it void in this state? As the appellant was not a nonresident, the case does not fall within the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff, and under the general authorities the judgment is valid in the state in which it was rendered. All that is necessary to be determined in this case is that a citizen and resident of California cannot escape the performance of his duties, and baffle our courts in their attempts to enforce the rights of others against him, by sudden flight and temporary absence, expressly intended for that purpose. Every rule of law, and every sentiment of justice, is an obstruction to the success of such strategy. Nor will the affirmance of the order appealed from be violative of either the general international law, or the American interstate law. A sovereign state might be justified in refusing to enforce within its own territory, and against one of its own citizens, a judgment rendered in another state upon substituted service; but neither its interest nor its dignity would be touched by the enforcement of such a judgment by another state within its territory, and against its own citizens.

We cannot see merit in the point made by appellant that the substituted service was not sufficiently in compliance with the statute of this state which provides for it. The main contention is that the statement in the affidavit for publication, that the defendant "has departed from the state of California, and is now absent therefrom," is of a mere conclusion, and not of a fact; but it would be difficult to suggest any other language that would express the facts of departure and absence with more clearness and certainty. The fact that a few of those words are used in the statute does not prevent their use in an affidavit, if they are apt words to express the meaning of the affiant.

Respondent contends, also, that the order appealed from should be affirmed upon the further grounds that those parts of the judgment which relate to the custody of the children and alimony are mere incidents to the divorce, and that the jurisdiction to grant the divorce, which is admitted on all hands, carries with it the jurisdiction of the incidents, and, furthermore, that the relation of children to parents is a status like that of marriage, and that, therefore, an action to determine the custody of children, like a suit for divorce, is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. But it is unnecessary to discuss these points at length, because the views heretofore expressed would be determinative of the case in favor of respondent upon another ground. We may say, however, that, so far as the custody of the children is concerned, this second contention of respondent seems to be correct. The judgment merely determines generally the custody of the children, and whether it could be enforced in another state or country is not here involved. It is settled law that a decree of divorce operates upon the relation, the status, and that, therefore, such a decree founded upon constructive service by publication is valid, even as against one resident and domiciled beyond the state. See cases cited on pages 273, 274, 48 Am. Dec. A judgment for divorce is quasi, at least, in rem. Judgments in rem, it is well known, are not, as the name implies, confined to adjudications against things. They are rendered in many instances where the prior proceedings are entirely in personam, as in cases establishing or dissolving marriages. Freem. Judgm. § 606. In Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 734, 735, 24 L. ed. 572, 573, it is said: "The jurisdiction which every state possesses to determine the civil status and capacities of all its inhabitants involves authority to prescribe the conditions on which proceedings affecting them may be commenced and carried on within its territory." Now, is not the relation between parent and child a "civil status?" It is so assumed to be in Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 499. In Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. § 1189, it is said that "the relation of parent and child is a status, . . . like marriage." And in Re Newman's Estate, 75 Cal. 213, the court said: "So far as the action of Maldonado v. Maldonado affected the status of the parties and the custody of the child, it was a proceeding in rem, and service by publication in such case is good." See also Wakefield v. Ives, 35 Iowa, 238, and People, Allen, v. Allen, 40 Hun, 611. In Brenot v. Brenot, 102 Cal. 294, it was held that in an action for divorce the custody of the children was an incident in the main relief sought,—the divorce. See also Younger v. Younger, 106 Cal. 377.

Upon these authorities, and upon principle, we think that, in an action brought for both divorce and the custody of the children, the latter is an incident of the former, and that the court has jurisdiction over the status founded on the relation of parent and child, as well as of the status founded on the relation of husband and wife, even as against a bona fide nonresident domiciled elsewhere. And in such a case the actual physical presence of the children is no more necessary for jurisdiction over the status in the one instance than is the presence of the husband necessary in the other. It is not necessary to determine whether or not jurisdiction to decree alimony would follow as an incident to the divorce. It is doubtful if the judgment in this case really awards any alimony, but, if it does, its validity in that respect has sufficient basis in the proposition first discussed in this opinion.

With respect to the statement of facts hereinbefore made, it is proper to observe that where, as in this case, the appeal is from a mere order of the court below granting or denying a motion, and where findings are not necessary, this court will assume the existence of such facts necessary to support the ruling of the lower court as fairly appear from the evidence. Here the preponderance of the evidence is largely in support of the facts above stated. Indeed, the fact that appellant fled the state, and clandestinely carried away the children, to avoid the action, is too apparent to be even debatable. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

NOTE.—Power of local church society to withdraw from the general body of a church.

Of course, in this country there is nothing to prevent individuals or congregations from withdrawing from denominational ties at pleasure. The only question that can arise is as to their right to take the church property with them.

There are few decisions involving this question simply as it is stated above. There are some cases in which the rights of independent churches have been considered, and more in which the rights of majority and minority members have been involved, but in few cases has the entire body of the local church attempted a separation from the denomination.

Independent congregations.

In cases of independent congregations, in the absence of anything to control the action in the title deed of the church property, it seems that they may make and break connections with other churches and with denominations at will.

A Congregational church has power by a majority vote to change religious views or form of church government at pleasure. Wiswell v. First Cong. Church, 14 Ohio St. 31.

An incorporated Protestant church which is in itself independent of a higher authority may by means of a majority vote change its creed or form of government without any power of the minority to interfere. Keyser v. Stansifer, 6 Ohio, 363.

In Trinitarian Cong. Soc. v. Union Cong. Soc. 61 N. H. 384, the court, in speaking of a Congregational church, says as there is no law requiring a church to be connected with a religious society it may exist without such connection. Its relations are such as it chooses.

If the congregation is an independent one and connects itself with a synod so as to form a confederation of self-governing churches its withdrawal therefrom cannot be considered as a withdrawal from the church body so as to constitute a perversion of the trust. Fadness v. Braunborg, 73 Wis. 257.

If the church is independent in its relations it may change its affiliations, although it has been in the habit of sending delegates to a particular synod. Landis's Appeal, 102 Pa. 467.

But in case of a schism and withdrawal of part of the members of a congregation the remainder will have a right to the church property. Craigdallie v. Aikman, 2 Bligh, 529.

And it has been held that the majority of the members of a Baptist church, although it is independent in government, have no power to divert the church property to the propogation of doctrines contrary to Baptist articles of faith and church covenants; and on attempting to do so, they may be enjoined from interfering with the proper use and control of the property by the minority. Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore, 83 Iowa, 138, 13 L. R. A. 198.

Rights of majority and minority.

Many cases of attempted withdrawals have been decided upon the general rule governing the rights of majority and minority members of a divided congregation. Authorities upon that question are collected in a note to Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore (Iowa) 13 L. R. A. 198. In this note only those are gathered in which an attempt was made to withdraw from denominational ties.

An organized church cannot be devested of its property by the majority of the members who enter a new organization and adopt the name of the old church, if the original organization still exists. Venable v. Coffman, 2 W. Va. 310.

The majority cannot change the relations of the church. Reeves v. Walker, 8 Baxt. 277.

members of a religious association which voluntarily connected itself with a particular denomination and acquired property in such connection, cannot withdraw such property from its connection with the denomination against the protest of the minority nor prevent its use by persons remaining in the denomination and representing its regular organization.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Bay County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce rights in certain church property. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

The bill in this case contains, in substance, the following averments:

The Evangelical Association of North America is a religious denomination organized about 1800, under the "connectional" or "associated" form of church government, founded upon that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and having a system of graded, executive, legislative, and judicial ecclesiastical bodies and officers, and a code of rules known as the "Discipline." The territory covered by said denomination is divided into "Annual Conference Districts," in each of which is held a yearly meeting of the preachers of the denomination located within such district. Every preacher who holds a pastorate within the district must attend every session of his conference. For certain purposes of local administration, each annual conference exercises jurisdiction over all its own members, and over the congregations within its limits. By the general conference held every four years, bishops are elected for a term of four years. It is the special duty of a bishop to preside over the annual conferences, and, with the aid of the presiding elders thereof, to appoint at the conference session the preachers to their respective pastoral charges for the ensuing year, "the same being the only recognized method of appointing ministers in use in said denomination since its origin. Neither the lay members of the several congregations, nor the trustees thereof, according to the discipline of said denomination, have any voice or vote in the selection of their pastors, nor any power to reject a pastor who has been appointed in the manner aforesaid." The Michigan annual conference of this denomination has been in existence over sixteen years, and has always embraced within its limits all the preachers, members, and congregations of the denomination in Bay county, Mich. Each annual conference elects presiding elders, for service within its own bounds, and for terms of office not exceeding four years. Each year the conference assigns to each presiding elder a certain district within its territory for supervision. Under the discipline, a presiding elder is required to superintend the spiritual and temporal affairs of the denomination within his district, to enforce all disciplinary provisions, to hold services, and otherwise to officiate in the various houses of worship in his district, and once in every three months to call and preside over a quarterly conference, held in the house of worship of each pastoral charge. A minority cannot against the will of the majority change the relations of the church to its denomination. Deaderick v. Lampson, 11 Heisk. 523.

In case of a division in the congregation the title to the property is in that portion which adheres to the denomination and conforms to its rules. Rosbi's Appeal, 69 Pa. 466, 8 Am. Rep. 275.

In church organizations those who adhere to and submit to the regular order of the church, local and general, although a minority, are the true congregation and corporation, if incorporated, and they are the ones who are entitled to the use and control of the church property. Winebrenner v. Colder, 43 Pa. 244; Trexeler v. Menning, 2 W. N. C. 677, 33 Phila. Leg. Int. 321.

The majority cannot control in violation of the general laws of the organization. Sutter v. First Reformed Dutch Church, 42 Pa. 503.

It is the duty of the court to decide in favor of those, whether a minority or majority of the congregation, who are adhering to the doctrine professed by the congregation and the form of worship in practice, as also in favor of the government of the church in operation with which it was connected at the time the trust was declared. App v. United Lutheran & G. Reformed Cong. 6 Pa. 201.

Seceders from the Methodist Episcopal Church who have organized a separate conference and rejected the office of bishop are not entitled to any portion of the property of the society from which they seceded. Methodist Episcopal Church v. Wood, 5 Ohio, 283.

Seceders have no right in the church property. Rottmann v. Bartling, 22 Neb. 375; Ehrenfeldt's Appeal, 101 Pa. 186.

Seceding members of a church have at common law no interest in its property. Curd v. Wallace, 7 Dana, 190, 32 Am. Dec. 85.

By seceding from the organization even a majority of the members of a congregation will forfeit their rights to the church property. Lewis v. Watson, 4 Bush, 228; Brown v. Monroe, 80 Ky. 443.

In Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S. v. Church of Christ, 60 Fed. Rep. 937, the doctrine is referred to with apparent approval that the courts will adjudge the property to the members, however few in numbers they may be, who adhere to the form of church government or acknowledge the church connection for which the property was acquired.

In Bouldin v. Alexander, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 131, 21 L. ed. 69, it is said that it may be conceded for the purposes of that case that withdrawal from a church and uniting with another church or denomination are a relinquishment of all right in the church abandoned.

Where the consistory of a Dutch Reformed church being displeased with the action of the classis on a particular question dissolved its connection therewith and attempted to withdraw and form a connection with the True Dutch Reformed Church, whereupon the classis dissolved their connection with the church and ordered the election of a new consistory, it was held that their connection with the old church ceased and that the property belonged to the new consistory elected by order of the classis to fill their places. Den, Dey, v. Bolton, 12 N. J. L. 236.

Members of a church which separate themselves wholly from the church organization to which they belong, deny its authority, denounce its doctrine, and refuse to abide by its judgments as well as join themselves to a totally different organization, have no right to the property of the church or to the use of it. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666.

Trustees of a church in connection with the

this denomination a pastor's appointment over any particular charge lasts for one year only, though he may be reappointed at annual conference, but not more than three times in succession. A presiding elder's appointment over any particular district in like manner is good for only one year, though he may be reappointed over the same district four times in succession. Under the discipline and usages of the denomination, each pastor and presiding elder is entitled, by virtue of his office, to certain emoluments derived from collections taken up among the members of their charges. Every pastor who is a married man is entitled to occupy the parsonage belonging to his congregation. "Stewards" are appointed in each charge, to collect funds to pay the pastor's salary, and to procure a dwelling-place for him, if a married man. Under the discipline, each quarterly conference has to provide for the support of the pastor and presiding elder, and every member must contribute to their support according to his means, under penalty of trial under the church rules. The discipline also provides that each annual conference shall provide for the yearly salary of its preachers. In 1886 the Michigan conference enacted that each presiding elder should be entitled to a yearly salary of at least $500, and each pastor of the rank of elder should receive the same amount. The discipline provides "that, when any trustee of a church of this denomination withdraws from the denomination, he shall cease to be trustee," and also that, "when any land is conveyed for the use of any congregation of said denomination, said land shall be kept in trust to be kept, used, and maintained as a place of divine worship by the ministers and membership of the Evangelical Association of North America, with power to dispose of and convey the same, subject to the discipline, usages, and ministerial appointments of said church or association, as from time to time authorized and declared by the general conference thereof, or by the particular annual conference within whose bounds the said premises are located." In like manner with regard to parsonages, the discipline provides "that, if any land is conveyed to said denomination or any of its congregations for the erection of a dwelling-house for the use of preachers, the said land must be held in trust to be kept, used, and maintained as a place of residence for the preachers of the denomination who may from time to time be duly stationed in said place, with power to dispose of and to convey the same, subject to the discipline and usages of said denomination." In the year 1878 there was organized, "as a voluntary association," by and among members of the denomination in and about Bay City, under the supervision of a preacher of said denomination, a congregation thereof under the name of "Zion's Church of the Evangelical Association of North America in Bay City, County of Bay, State of Michigan." Until the acts of the defendants herein complained of, said congregation, without dissent, always acted as, and claimed to be, a part of said denomination, and subject to its rules and usages, and to the jurisdiction of the general conference of the denomination and of the Michigan annual con-

Dutch Reformed Church of the United States cannot against the will of dissenting members dissolve their connection with that church and with the classis to which they were united, and transfer the property and their connection to the German Lutheran Church. Gable v. Miller, 10 Paige, 627.

In Miller v. Gable, 2 Denio, 492, the court reversed the opinion of the chancellor, but the judges who wrote opinions did not agree as to the ground of reversal. Gardiner, president, thought that the terms of the trust had not been violated, but intimated the opinion that the trustees of a church are not independent of all control in reference to doctrines and modes of worship. While Barlow, senator, thought that if property is given to a corporation without any explicit declaration in the deed limiting the use to a particular channel, a majority of the members or trustees are at liberty to deviate from the doctrine which prevailed at the time of donation, and that such deviation would not produce a forfeiture or entitle the minority adhering to the faith professed at the time the donation was made to the enjoyment of the property to the exclusion of the majority who have acquiesced in the change.

Rule under particular statutes.

Under some state statutes it is held that a majority of the members of incorporated churches may control the property and the uses to which it shall be applied.

Under a former New York statute for the incorporation of religious societies no trust can be attached to property which will compel its retention in a particular denomination. The whole income of the church is under the control of a majority of the members, and their action will determine the disposition of the trust. If the society wishes to devote its property to an unchangeable form of worship and tie down its members to a procrustean bed of creeds and confessions of faith, it must remain a voluntary association, and not commit the management of its affairs to a corporation. Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243, Reversing on this point 9 Barb. 64.

The majority of the members of a corporation under the New York law may change their form of worship and their denominational affiliations at any time they choose to do so. Petty v. Tooker, 21 N. Y. 267, Affirming 29 Barb. 256.

Under the New York statute a majority of the corporators without respect to their religious tenets have entire control over the revenues of the church. Gram v. Prussia Emigrated Evangelical Lutheran German Soc. 36 N. Y. 161; Watkins v. Wilcox, 66 N. Y. 654.

If a religious society thinks proper to separate from the church with which it has previously been connected and to form a connection with another denomination, the trustees have the power to employ a minister as they think fit and to exclude from the pulpit a minister appointed by the ecclesiastical judicatory with which the society was previously connected, and a court of equity has no power to control their action. Burrel v. Associate Reformed Church, 44 Barb. 282.

The majority of a Dutch Reformed church incorporated under the New York law may withdraw from connection with that church and organize a Congregational church, taking their property with them. Watkins v. Wilcox, 4 Hun, 220.

But under the New York act of 1875, which forbids the trustees of a religious denomination to divert the property to the uses of other than its own denomination, trustees who form a new society in connection with another denomination for the purpose of applying the property of the former society to the uses of the new one thereby cease to be trusference; and, in particular, said congregation always accepted as their pastor and presiding elder only such persons as had been appointed thereto according to the discipline and usages of said denomination. "With a single exception, the said Zion's society, in each and every year after its organization, in 1878, up to the spring of 1891, solicited and received from the said Michigan annual conference an appropriation or contribution of money, for the purpose of maintaining the said society, and paying its current expenses as a society belonging to said denomination. At times such yearly appropriations amounted to $500." In 1878, with money contributed for the purpose by members of the denomination within the bounds of the Michigan conference, and by the members of said conference, there was purchased, and in part paid for, a lot of ground in Bay City (describing the same); and, with funds derived from the same sources, said society thereupon erected upon said lot a building, which was used for a house of worship according to the rules and discipline of said Evangelical Association. In November, 1882, the owner of said lot conveyed the same in fee to "Zion's Church of the Evangelical Association of North America in Bay City, County of Bay, State of Michigan." The deed contains the following clause: "This deed being made pursuant to a contract for the sale of said premises made by Jennie F. Paine to August Meisel, Frederic Koch, and August Kosky, bearing date the said 8th day of June, 1878, which contract has been assigned by said Meisel, Koch, and Kosky to the trustees of said party of the second part hereto, and said premises having been conveyed subject to said contract by said Jennie F. Paine to James T. Lawson, by said Lawson conveyed to Hiram A. Jones, and by said Jones conveyed to John W. Forsyth, above named."

Afterwards, in 1889, with funds contributed by members of the denomination both in said Zion's society and elsewhere within the bounds of the Michigan conference, and collected by preachers of said conference from persons not members, upon the representation that such contributions were to be used to erect a church of said denomination, there was erected by said society on lot 7 a new house of worship for use according to the usages and discipline of said denomination, and not otherwise. In laying the corner stone of said new edifice, the pastor in charge (being a person appointed thereto from the Michigan conference), in the presence of said congregation, and with its consent, used the forms perscribed in said discipline. These forms require the officiating clergyman to declare that "we lay this corner stone as the foundation of a house to be dedicated to the service of the Most High, according to the order and rules and for the use of the Evangelical Association." Afterwards, when completed, said edifice was dedicated under the discipline by a bishop of said denomination. The disciplinary form required the bishop to declare that "we now declare, designate, and consecrate this house as the [name of the church] of the Evangelical Association of [name of place]," for divine worship and the observance of "devotional services, tees of the former and will be enjoined from interference with the property. First Reformed Presby. Church v. Bowden, 10 Abb. N. C. 1.

Under the act of 1875 the congregation as well as the trustees are deprived of the power to divert the church property from the promotion of the religious tenets of the persons obtaining and requiring it and the maintenance of a different system of religious belief. Isham v. First Presby. Church, 63 How. Pr. 465.

Under the Illinois statute the trustees of a corporation do not, in the absence of any expressly declared or clearly implied trust, hold the property for the benefit of any particular doctrines or tenets of faith, but simply for the society or congregation whose officers they are. Calkins v. Cheney, 92 Ill. 463.

If persons are incorporated under a statute which permits any five persons to form themselves into a religious society under articles of incorporation which do not designate the denomination to which they shall belong except that the name adopted indicates an intention to belong to a particular denomination, property acquired by a general deed without any trust limitation is not devoted to the use of the denomination whose name they adopted, but a majority of the members of the church may permit the property to be used in connection with a different denomination. Wilson v. Livingstone, 99 Mich. 594.

Under the Virginia laws the general church can have no claim to or control over the property of a local church, but that must be governed by the terms of the deed and the action of the local congregation. Boxwell v. Affleck, 79 Va. 407.

Property acquired under express trust or for particular purpose.

The deed by which the property is given may limit the use to a particular denomination. Means v. Presbyterian Church, 3 Watts & S. 303.

When property has by express dedication been devoted to the support of some specific form of religious doctrine it cannot be diverted to other and different doctrinal uses. Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 679, 20 L. ed. 666.

Land conveyed in trust for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of religious corporations of regular orthodox Methodist Protestants, which may assemble to worship at the church building thereon, and for no other use or purpose whatever, cannot be claimed by persons who did not pretend to belong to the Methodist Protestant church but to another church entirely, although a majority of the Methodist Protestant congregation have joined the latter church and attempted to take their property with them. Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 11 L. R. A. 214.

Where a conveyance is made to a religious society by its denominational name it may be a sufficient guide as to the nature of the trust created, and those having control of the property will not be permitted to apply it to the promotion of doctrines adverse to the fundamental doctrines of the denomination for whose benefit the trust is created. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

When property is acquired while the church is in subordination to a particular denomination a majority of the members cannot break off this connection and carry the property into another denomination. Jones v. Wadsworth, 11 Phila. 227.

When a church has been organized and endowed, whether by donation or subscription, as belonging to any particular sect or in subordination to any particular form of church government, it cannot break off from that connection and government. Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415.

rules, and customs adopted and practiced in public worship by the Evangelical Association." In November, 1884, with funds subscribed by members of the Evangelical Association, and solicited by the pastor in charge (appointed from the Michigan conference), there was purchased by the said Zion's society another lot (number 6) in Bay City. Such lot was conveyed by the owner to "the Zion Church of the Evangelical Association of North America in Bay City, County of Bay, State of Michigan." In the early spring of 1889, said Zion's congregation solicited and received from said Michigan annual conference $500, to be used in part payment for a parsonage to be erected on said lot 6. With the money so donated, and with other funds contributed by the members of the denomination there was erected on said lot a parsonage "for the use, as a dwelling-house, of the preacher who should be duly appointed at the Michigan annual conference as the pastor of said congregation under the discipline." Until 1893 no person had ever been admitted to membership in said congregation except such as were members of the denomination; and no one had acted as trustee or officer of the congregation except persons who had been admitted to the denomination and into said congregation according to the rules of the denomination. At a regular session of said Michigan conference, in April, 1890, the complainant Rev George A. Hettler was elected presiding elder for the ensuing four years; and at a session of said conference in April, 1893, the district which includes said Bay City charge was assigned to said Hettler for the ensuing year. Said Hettler is a duly-ordained elder of the denomination, and a member of said conference, and was such prior to 1890. The complainant Rev. John M. Fuchs is a duly ordained elder of the denomination, and a member of said Michigan conference. At the session of said conference held in April, 1893, he was appointed by the presiding bishop, with the aid of the presiding elders, of said conference, pastor of said Zion's Church. Said complainant is a married man. Since their appointment, as aforesaid, said Hettler and Fuchs have endeavored to enter said church, and officiate therein, as presiding elder and pastor, respectively; and said Fuchs has demanded from defendants the possession and the right to occupy the said parsonage. But the defendants and their adherents in said congregation have excluded both of said complainants from the church and said Fuchs from the parsonage, and have denied their official authority, and threaten to continue so to do, and to exclude them "from the enjoyment of any perquisites or emoluments belonging to the office of presiding elder and pastor, respectively, of said charge;" but they recognize the defendant Schneider as their lawful pastor, and they admit him into said church as pastor and permit him to receive the collections taken up for the pastor's salary, and have admitted him into the occupancy of the parsonage; and they threaten to continue thus to support said Schneider in the possession of said office, and the use of said church and parsonage. "In March, 1893, the defendants (save and except Schneider) and their adherents in the said con-it cannot be divided when a portion of the members dissolve their connection with that denomination for the purpose of appropriating it to the education of children of persons belonging to other denominations. Hendrickson v. Shotwell, 1 N. J. Eq. 577.

If property is contributed in trust to organize a church for the use of persons of all denominations, to be under the control of trustees of the Presbyterian church, the donors may prevent its being conveyed to the Methodist church to be held for the exclusive benefit of members of that denomination. Ludlam v. Higbee, 11 N. J. Eq. 342.

The property must be administered substantially in accordance with the intention of the original founders, and a minority can insist upon carrying out the purposes for which the church or society was organized, and a majority will not be permitted to divert the common property to their uses or to use it for the support and maintenance of doctrines essentially at variance with the original constitution of the society. Schradi v. Dornfeld, 52 Minn. 465.

Those having control of church property under a particular church organization have no power to transfer this property to a different sect or denomination or divert it from the purposes for which it was dedicated when in violation of the fundamental law upon which the organization is based. Kinkead v. McKee, 9 Bush, 535.

It is not in the power of a majority of a religious society to carry property which has been dedicated to the church to the support of a new and different doctrine. Smith v. Pedigo (Ind.) 19 L. R. A. 433.

The trustees of a church have no right to pervert the use of the property to any other purpose than that for which it was acquired. First Cong. Church v. Stewart, 43 Ill. 81.

If any persons taking the benefit of a trust for a church incline to the adoption of a different system from that which was intended by the founders and there are others who think proper to adhere to the original system, the latter will be entitled to the property. Atty. Gen., Mander, v. Pearson, 3 Meriv. 353.

Property acquired for a congregation adopting the doctrine and discipline of the Reformed church in the United States cannot be, by a majority of the members of the congregation, diverted to the use of the Lutherans. Baker v. Ducker, 79 Cal. 365.

A majority of a congregation have not the power, upon retiring from the denomination and forming a new and different religious organization, to control the property of the old association and divert it from the particular purposes to which it was dedicated. First Constitutional Presby. Church v. Congregational Soc. 23 Iowa, 567.

A majority of the members of a Free Will Baptist church cannot, against the will of the minority transfer property obtained for the use and benefit of that denomination to the Baptist denomination, notwithstanding a clause in its manual provides that a church in good standing may have letters of dismissal and recommendation to another evangelical denomination. Park v. Champlin (Iowa) 3 L. R. A. 141.

Seceders from a religious society are not entitled to share in the benefits of a fund held in trust for the society. Atty. Gen., Abbott, v. Dublin, 38 N. H. 459.

When a church is endowed with property for the support of a particular faith it is not competent for a majority of the church to appropriate the property for the maintenance of a different faith. Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches, 1 Sandf. Ch. 439.

Synodical relations.

In some of the cases a mere change of synodical relations has been attempted. In most cases such gregation formally resolved and declared that they would no longer submit to the authority or the rules of the officers of the constituted tribunals of the said Evangelical Association, but that they would separate from and be independent of the said Michigan annual conference in all respects, and they notified said conference of this resolution." The complainants Hebinger and Fenske are now, and for some years past have been, members of the denomination and of the said Zion's Church, and have attended worship at the latter, and have contributed to the support of said congregation. Said Hebinger has not attended services since the defendant Schneider has been acting as pastor, because he believed said Schneider not to be the lawful pastor. Besides the complainants, "there are a large number of the members of said congregation who dissent from such unlawful acts and proceedings and who still adhere to the said Evangelical Association and its rules, and still recognize and submit to the authority of the complainants Hettler and Fuchs, respectively, as their presiding elder and duly appointed pastor, and who desire the said church edifice and parsonage to be used by said Hettler and Fuchs as by the discipline required and permitted, as aforesaid." The defendant Schneider now holds, and refuses to surrender, the books and papers pertaining to the affairs of the congregation, which, under the discipline and usages of the denomination, rightfully belong to the custody of the lawful pastor,—such as the registers of marriages, births, deaths, etc., the membership lists, and the financial accounts of the congregation. Since April, 1893, the stewards of the congregation have collected funds applicable, under the usages of the denomination, to the payment of the pastor's salary. Part of said funds have been paid over to defendant Schneider. Defendants and their adherents threaten to continue to take up such collections, and pay them to said Schneider, to the extent of at least $600 per annum; and they pretend that they have hired the services of said Schneider, for a year or more, as pastor. In excuse of these unlawful acts, defendants and their adherents pretend that the said Michigan conference of 1893 was not a lawful conference of the Evangelical Association, and that therefore complainant Hettler's appointment over the presiding elder's district, and the complainant Fuchs' appointment as pastor, were not valid. In this regard complainants say that said Michigan conference of 1893 was composed of the preachers within the district theretofore duly fixed by general conference, and duly qualified under the discipline to be members of said body, and that the time and place at which it was convened had been duly fixed the preceding year by the presiding bishop, and a majority vote of said conference duly convened. The bishop presiding when complainant Fuchs was appointed pastor had been elected as bishop by a general conference of the denomination held in October, 1891, at Indianapolis.

The bill then sets forth facts to show the regularity and validity of said Indianapolis body as a general conference of this church. Prior to assuming the office of pastor of Zion's a change is immaterial. The property still remaining subject to the same laws as before, no rights are infringed.

In Smith v. Nelson, 18 Vt. 511, which was a case of secession from the decrees of a synod, the court seemed to recognize the right of a majority of a congregation to seize and control the church property, from the very nature of religious societies in this country.

The mere change of synodical relations will not forfeit the rights of the majority to the property. Lutheran Congregation v. St. Michael's Evangelical Church, 48 Pa. 20.

There is no forfeiture by refusal to accept the authority of a synod. Presbyterian Congregation v. Johnston, 1 Watts & S. 9.

A Lutheran church may sever its connection with the synod with which it had united itself. Heckman v. Mees, 16 Ohio, 583.

The mere withdrawal of a majority from the synod without any change of doctrine will not result in a forfeiture of the rights of the seceders in the church property. Ferraria v. Vasconcellos, 31 Ill. 25.

If property is acquired while a church is independent of any synod the mere fact that it subsequently connects itself to a synod will not prevent a majority from subsequently severing the connection. Lawson v. Kolbenson, 61 Ill. 405. The court said: "This church organization is unlike those of other denominations, where they cannot exist at all except in subordination to a higher and controlling organization."

In Dressen v. Brameier, 56 Iowa, 756, the question was as to dissolving the connection of the congregation with a particular synod within the church, and it appeared that the majority of the members had voted to remain with that synod while a minority desired to dissolve the connection and join another one. The court held that the majority ruled and was entitled to the use of the church property.

But if the property is procured not only for a particular congregation, but it is also stated that it is subject to certain particular and general synods, the majority of the congregation withdrawing from or refusing to recognize the authority of the synod cannot retain control of the property. McBride v. Porter, 17 Iowa, 203.

So, if a particular congregation is by the terms of its charter in full connection with a synodical body, and not independent of it, should a portion of the congregation secede from the synod it will forfeit its rights to the church property. Harmon v. Dreher, 1 Speers, Eq. 87.

So, if at the time the property is acquired by a church it is in connection with a particular synod a majority cannot afterwards, against the objection of the minority, dissolve the connection with the synod and become an independent church. Wilson v. Presbyterian Church, 2 Rich. Eq. 192.

Rule where governing body of denomination changes its laws.

Whether a local church can sever its connection with the denomination to which it is attached because the denomination has departed from the original doctrine to which they subscribed was not decided in Gable v. Miller, 10 Paige, 627.

In Associate Reformed Church v. Theological Seminary, 4 N. J. Eq. 77, where the synod had illegally attempted to merge the Reformed church into the Presbyterian church, it was held that as against dissenting local churches they would cease to have any title to the property, and that the dissenters could recover the property for the use of the denomination for whose use it was acquired.

The majority of the church following the act of the synod in making a lawful change in the church

Church, defendant Schneider had withdrawn from the Michigan conference and from the Evangelical Association. Complainants file their bill on behalf of the members of the denomination and of the Michigan conference, "and especially on behalf of the members of said Zion's Church congregation at Bay City who still adhere to the said Evangelical Association." The defendants (except Schneider) are the trustees of said Zion's Church, "and, as such, have the actual possession of the said church edifice and parsonage, and are exercising control thereover." The relief prayed is as follows: That defendants be restrained from interfering in any way with the complainant Hettler in the discharge of his duties as presiding elder of said congregation, and in taking up collections from said congregation for his salary; from withholding from said Hettler funds heretofore collected from said congregation as and for the salary of the presiding elder; from preventing Hettler from entering the church, and officiating therein as presiding elder, and from holding his quarterly conferences therein; from interfering with complainant Fuchs in the discharge of his duties as pastor; from preventing his entrance into the church, and from interfering with his collection of contributions for his salary; from withholding from said Fuchs funds already collected as and for the pastor's salary; from excluding Fuchs from the parsonage; from withholding from said Fuchs the said records, registers, etc., pertaining to the congregation, and lawfully belonging to the custody of the pastor. That defendant Schneider be restrained from acting as pastor of said congregation; from officiating in and about said church edifice as pastor; and from taking up collections from said congregation for pastor's salary. That the defendants account for moneys heretofore collected by them (as and for pastor's and presiding elder's salary) from said congregation, and be decreed to pay over the amount, when ascertained, to the complainants. That the rights of the respective parties be ascertained and decreed.

A demurrer was interposed, stating the following reasons: (1) That the bill covered "distinct matters and causes, in several whereof the complainants are not in any manner in common or jointly interested or concerned." (2) That the bill is multifarious. (3) That the bill states no cause for relief of any kind. The demurrer was sustained.

polity may control the church property as against the objection of a dissenting minority. McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9; Ramsey's Appeal, 88 Pa. 60.

Immaterial change.

In case of a mere change of form of church government if the majority retain the church organization a minority cannot wrest the property from them because of the change. Organ Meeting House v. Seaford, 1 Dev. Eq. 453.

If the church is not described in the original donation or subscription as in connection with or under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of any particular body of believers it may change its relation, provided there be in such change no radical departure from the original faith or doctrine. The guaranty of religious freedom does not guarantee the freedom to steal churches. It secures to individuals the right of withdrawal, forming a new society with such creed and government as they please, raising from their own means a fund, and building a house of worship; but it does not confer upon them the right of taking the property consecrated to other uses by those who may now be slumbering in their graves. Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. 138, 5 Am. Rep. 415.

Withdrawal under laws of church.

If the general body of the church divides and concedes to a majority of a local church the right to determine which branch it will adhere to, the majority, when it has made its choice, will have a right to the property as against the dissenting minority. Gibson v. Armstrong, 7 B. Mon. 481; Humphrey v. Burnside, 4 Bush, 215.

If the majority of the church votes to go with the Methodist Episcopal Church South in accordance with the plan adopted by the general conference to settle the question, those adhering to that decision, and not the dissenters, have a right to control the church property. Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Hoskinson v. Pusey, 32 Gratt. 428.

Division of property.

Members who dissolve their connection with the society to which they belong and the entire ecclesiastical body of which it is a part, and unite with a distinct organization, cannot be regarded as a party within the meaning of a statute requiring the division of church property between the parties in case a congregation is disrupted by a schism or a division of the society. McKinney v. Griggs, 5 Bush, 401, 96 Am. Dec. 360.

Effect of statutory permission.

An act providing that in the contingency of a division of any religious society the majority may determine to which branch such congregation shall thereafter belong, which determination shall conclude questions as to the property held in trust for such congregation, is void as a violation of a contract, so far as it attempts to give the benefit of trust property to others than those to whom it was exclusively limited by the one creating the trust. Finley v. Brent, 87 Va. 103, 11 L. R. A. 214.

Effect of unanimous action.

In Harper v. Straws, 14 B. Mon. 48, it appears to be decided that the unanimous action of a church congregation, people, and officers, in severing their connection with one and connecting themselves with a different organization, subjects the church property to the constitution and laws of such latter organization, provided there is nothing in the deed to prevent it, and that case is cited in support of that doctrine in First Presby. Church v. Wilson, 14 Bush, 252.

The objects of this trust are easily and with certainty ascertained at any moment, as the discipline discloses, every member has his name inscribed on a membership list, which is in the custody of the pastor, and the records of each conference will disclose at any moment the name of the person who has the legal right to serve as pastor and presiding elder of any congregation.

Messrs. Pratt, Van Kleeck & Gilbert for appellees.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. We see no force in the contention that the bill sets forth no grievance common to all the complainants, and seeks no common relief. The complainants are interested in the same subject matter, and all claim one common right to use the church, although in different ways. Fuchs, as pastor, and Hettler, as presiding elder, are entitled to the use of it for the purpose of conducting divine worship. Fuchs is entitled to the use of the parsonage in connection with the church, and the other complainants are entitled to the use of the church for the purpose of worship according to its discipline and usages. We therefore think the bill is not multifarious.

2 While the bill alleges that Zion's Church at Bay City is not a corporation, but a voluntary association, it is nevertheless insisted that it is a corporation, because the bill shows that it has exercised the franchises and privileges of a corporation for a term of more than ten successive years; that it has bought and held real estate in its corporate name, has erected a church and parsonage, and that all its temporal affairs are controlled by a board of trustees. It is therefore argued that its rights must be controlled by the same rules that apply to religious societies duly incorporated. In support of this, § 4649 of Howell's Statutes is cited. This section provides that, "whenever any religious society or corporation shall have exercised the franchises and privileges of a corporation for the term of ten successive years, the same shall be presumed to have been legally organized in pursuance of the laws of this state." This statute creates only a presumption. It does not of itself change a voluntary organization by lapse of time into a corporation. It was held in Smith v. Bonhoof, 2 Mich. 129, that, under this statute, "no church can become incorporated, provided the powers conferred by the statute upon the corporators are by the constitution, laws, or usages of the church, lodged in another body." See also Allen v. Duffie, 43 Mich. 3, 38 Am. Rep. 159; Methodist Episcopal Church v. Clark, 41 Mich. 730. The allegation, therefore, that the church is a voluntary association, must be assumed as true.

3. It is next argued that no trust is created by the conveyance in favor of the Evangelical Association of North America; that, therefore, the legal title is in the local church; and that the Evangelical Association of North America obtained no right to the church property or its use, under the statute abolishing uses and trusts. The complete answer to this argument is that the general association is not a complainant in this case, nor is it seeking to enforce any title to or claim over the property. The complainants claim the right to its use under the discipline and usages. A conveyance or bequest to a religious association, or to trustees for that association, necessarily implies a trust. The deed in this case shows that the contract was made to certain persons as trustees for the church, and that the deed was made pursuant to that contract. We would naturally look to the written declarations in the constitution, by-laws, and written documents of the organization, to ascertain the trust and the purpose for which the property was conveyed. If the deed refers expressly or by implication to such writings, courts will look there for the declaration of the trust. It is by no means clear that these defendants, who are now the trustees, are in position to set up the statute of frauds. Neither the grantor nor any other person claiming under him is setting up this claim. Both parties claim under the same conveyance. In Lynd v. Menzies, 33 N. J. L. 164, it is said: "The imperfection relied on was the absence of an incorporation. But the want of this quality does not at all affect the rights and duties of pastor and people towards each other. The effect of becoming incorporated is to facilitate the acquisition and transfer of property, and to enable the congregation to be represented in the convention of the diocese. But by the canonical law of this denomination of Christians, it is not necessary, in order to constitute a church, that the congregation should take the form of an incorporated body. Indeed, the very law of this state which provides for the incorporation of this class of churches presupposes and requires that there shall be antecedent to the inception of proceedings, 'a congregation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this state, duly organized according to the constitution and usages of said church.' . . . In the case now before us, it plainly appears that this church was constituted in conformity to the ecclesiastical law and usages applicable to it, and the consequence is that the plaintiff, by his official connection with it, acquired all the customary powers and privileges pertaining to the rectorship." In any view of the case, the allegations of the bill are sufficient to require an answer and proofs.

4. The principal and important question in the case is whether the trustees and the members of this local church at Bay City can, by a majority vote, withdraw its connection with the general body, take the church property with them, set aside the itinerant plan, and deprive their regularly appointed ministers of its use. In this determination the allegations of the bill alone can be considered. Ex parte affidavits, which were used upon the hearing for a preliminary injunction, cannot be considered in the nature of an answer, and must be entirely excluded from this discussion. It is insisted that under How. Stat. § 4639, the violation of church discipline and church law is to be corrected by ecclesiastical tribunals, and that the state courts have no jurisdiction. Courts, of course, will not set aside the decrees and orders of ecclesiastical courts involving the construction of their own articles of faith or discipline. But this statute has never been so construed as to deprive those entitled to property rights under the conclusive ecclesiastical order and decree, of a remedy which they otherwise have not. Buettner v. Frazer, 100 Mich. 179, does not aid the defendants, for it was there said that "both parties must first exhaust the remedies afforded by the ecclesiastical body before the courts will consider the questions involved." See also Smith v. Bonhoof, 2 Mich. 116, where is found an able discussion of this provision of the statute. Nor is this case ruled by that of Wilson v. Livingstone, 99 Mich. 594. In that case the church was a corporation organized under the statutes of this state, and the difference between such a corporation and the case of a voluntary society was expressly recognized. It was there stated that the "obligations and rights of the members of a voluntary society are to be measured by their articles of association or constitution." In the present case the bill recognizes the defendant trustees as the lawful trustees, in charge and in possession of the church property. No attempt is made to deprive them of its control or possession when used in a legitimate manner. The only purpose is to compel them to permit the use of the church and parsonage according to the discipline, rules, usages, and polity of the church. It is immaterial in whom the legal title stands. One party may hold the title and another be entitled to the use and possession of the property; or, as in this case, both may be entitled to its joint use and possession. It may be admitted for the purposes of this hearing that the title is in the local society or its board of trustees. The question is not, as in many of the cases cited in the briefs of counsel, in whom is the title to the property? but, in whom is the right to its use for religious worship both as pastor and layman? The bill sets forth fully the history, the discipline, and polity of the church, the title of complainants Hettler and Fuchs to the offices which they hold, and the right to the use of the church property to which said officers are entitled. The question presented relates exclusively to property rights, over which the proper courts have almost universally exercised jurisdiction. If the defendants' position be the true one, it follows that they are in no manner bound to the faith and tenets of this church, and that they may withdraw, and take the property to any other denomination of Christians. The plan of the Evangelical Association is identical with that of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The itineracy of its clergy is one of its chief distinctive and fundamental principles. The church at Bay City entered into the voluntary association with full knowledge of its discipline, rules, and usages, and agreed to be bound thereby. Its property was not purchased with funds raised entirely by its own members, but in part by members of the Michigan conference and others, for the purpose of erecting a church of said denomination. The building was consecrated in accordance with its discipline, and for many years, and until after the schism in the church, the local body at Bay City accepted the pastor and elder appointed by the proper authorities. The churches of this body, when they entered it, voluntarily surrendered the right to choose their own pastor, and agreed to accept the pastor appointed by the bishop with the aid of the presiding elders. Many authorities might be cited sustaining the rights of complainants, but we shall refer to but few. They may be found in the briefs of counsel. This religious body is nearly identical in its discipline with that of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In each the itineracy of the clergy is one of the articles of its discipline. The right of the trustees of a local church of that denomination to close its doors against a pastor appointed by the bishop was passed upon in Whitcar v. Michenor, 37 N. J. Eq 6, a case identical in its facts with the present one. The trustees in that case closed the building against the duly appointed pastor, on the ground that it was not for the interest of the church that he should be its pastor, and that he was appointed against the wishes of the majority of its members. The court says: "It is not claimed that there is any warrant in the discipline of the church for the action of the trustees, nor that the discipline provides that the wishes of the majority of the members shall determine whether the preacher appointed to the charge shall act as such or not. If the church belongs to the Methodist Episcopal connection, as it is admitted it does, there is no warrant of law, discipline, or usage for the acts of the defendants. What is known as the itineracy of the preachers and the absolute power of the bishops over the appointments of the preachers to the churches is part of the discipline." An injunction was issued in that case to prevent the trustees from closing the church building against the regularly appointed pastor. In a footnote to that case are collated many authorities bearing upon the question, as well as upon the jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant an injunction. Counsel for defendants, in their brief, admits that the local church at Bay City adheres to the faith of the Evangelical Association, and they say that the church services and Sunday school are conducted in the same manner and in the same faith as before, and that it withdrew in order to keep away from the factions of the association. The reasons for such action are stated in the brief. In the freedom of conscience and the right to worship allowed in this country, the defendants and the members of this church undoubtedly possessed the right to withdraw from it, with or without reason. But they could not take with them, for their own purposes, or transfer to any other religious body, the property dedicated to and conveyed for the worship of God under the discipline of this religious association; nor could they prevent its use by those who chose to remain in the church, and who represent the regular church organization. If complainants maintain the allegations of their bill, that they represent the regularly organized body of the church, and are its regular appointees, they are entitled to the relief prayed.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings, with costs of both courts.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Benton & Choate, for defendant:

The plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care. If it be assumed that the defendant was responsible for the existence of the hole, the injury complained of did not result from any act of the defendant but from its omission. The defendant was not bound to establish the toilet room. The plaintiff would have had no ground of complaint had the defendant failed altogether to furnish a toilet. ercise of the same degree of care which she might have expected while a passenger on board one of its trains.

Moreland v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 141 Mass. 31.

The mere existence of a hole without evidence of how it was caused or how long it had been there is not evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. Though in a building controlled by the defendant it was not so exclusively controlled by it as to prevent interference by third parties. It was not a thing which in its nature and ordinary use would be used solely by the defendant.

Co.* 160 Mass. 392.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only exception in this case is to the refusal of the judge to rule that upon all the evidence the plaintiff cannot recover. The plaintiff went to the defendant's passenger station in Holbrook to take a train for South Braintree. She bought a ticket, and passed from the ladies' waiting room into the ladies' toilet room, which opened out of the waiting room. There was no light in any part of the station, except the ticket office. The door of the toilet room was open. The plaintiff had often been there before, and was familiar with the place. She had occasion to use the toilet room, and when she felt with her hand for the seat she failed to find it, and fell through an opening in the floor and was injured. The opening of the station for the sale of tickets upon a train which was about to pass over the railroad, and the condition of the station at the time, were an invitation to persons to come there if they wished to take a train; and the maintenance of a toilet room for a long time previously, the door of which was then open, was an invitation to lady passengers to enter if they wished to use it. The plaintiff was a passenger, and the defendant owed her the highest degree of care consistent with the proper management of the business in which it was engaged. Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co. 148 Mass. 207, 2 L. R. A. 83.

The existence of a dangerous hole in the floor of the toilet room, under the circumstances, was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. There was also evidence that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. She had been familiar with the toilet room for many years, and she had no reason to suppose that it was dangerous to enter it. That it was not then lighted was not very significant in view of the fact that the ladies' and gentlemen's waiting rooms were also without lights, except from the ticket office. The jury might find that after she entered it she did what ordinarily prudent persons might be expected to do under like circumstances.

It is contended that the plaintiff should not be permitted to recover because the accident happened on the evening of the Lord's Day. This argument, if it would otherwise be valid, is answered by the Statute of 1884, chap. 37, which is as follows: And "the provisions of chapter 98 of the Public Statutes, relating to the observance of the Lord's Day, shall not constitute a defense to an action for a tort or injury suffered by a person on that day."

Exceptions overruled.

Failure to remove logs after they are cut, within the time named in the contract for the sale and removal of timber within a definite time, does not forfeit the title.

(March 3, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Montcalm County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover the value of certain timber alleged to have been converted by defendant's assignor. Affirmed.

NOTE.—In connection with the above case as to forfeiture of timber for failure to take it away within the time agreed, see similar decisions in Magnetic Ore Co. v. Marbury Lumber Co. (Ala.) 27 L. R. A. 435.

As to written sales of timber, see also Mee v. Benedict (Mich.) 22 L. R. A. 641; Fish v. Capwell (R. I.) 25 L. R. A. 159; Yockey v. Norn (Mich.) 26 L. R. A. 145.

As to oral sales of standing timber, see Hirth v. Graham (Ohio) 19 L. R. A. 721.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. McGarry & Nichols, for plaintiff in error:

The language of this contract is plain and unambiguous. It positively states that the said J. S. Wiedman is to remove the timber in two years from the date of the contract, and sooner, in case the land is sold before that time, on being notified. A condition is placed in the contract by the vendor and accepted by the vendee, and like clauses have been so construed by this court time and again to be a condition.

Green v. Bennett, 23 Mich. 464; Richards v. Tozer, 27 Mich. 451; Johnson v Moore, 28 Mich. 4; Haskell v. Ayres, 32 Mich. 93, 35 Mich. 89; Utley v. Wilcox Lumber Co. 59 Mich. 263; Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 487; Wasey v. Mahoney, 55 Mich. 194; Gamble v. Gates, 92 Mich. 510, 97 Mich. 465; Prentiss v. Ross's Estate, 96 Mich. 83.

The fact of the timber being severed from the land and not being removed would make no difference in regard to the timber reverting.

Johnson v. Moore, supra; Monroe v. Bowen, 26 Mich. 523; Reed v. Merrifield, 10 Met. 155; Saltonstall v. Little, 90 Pa. 422, 35 Am. Rep. 683; Judevine v. Goodrich, 35 Vt. 19; Lyons v. Webb, 41 N. J. L. 203, 32 Am. Rep. 193.

I have endeavored to show that the exception is unconditional; and if this be so, by its own efficacy, it kept the title of the timber in the plaintiff; but, if to the contrary, the property in the timber was not to remain in the plaintiff, unless the trees were removed within such a period, then very clearly the mere felling of the trees would not satisfy the requirements of such condition.

Mr. Vernon H. Smith, with Messrs. Whittlesey & Kennedy, for defendants in error:

In this case the language is unequivocal that the timber was sold to Wiedman. It was not executory.

Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 490; Haskell v. Ayres, 35 Mich. 90.

If the limitation as to time of removal is construed to be a covenant on the part of the purchaser, then without question he could remove the timber after the expiration of the time, and only be liable for damages for so doing.

Williams v. Flood, supra; Green v. Bennett, 23 Mich. 470; Johnson v. Moore. 28 Mich. 3.

Conditions subsequent are not favored in law, and are construed strictly because they tend to destroy estates.

Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 43, 18 Am. Rep. 142, and cases cited in note 1.

They must be expressed in terms clear and unambiguous.

Rawson v. School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen, 125, 83 Am. Dec. 670; Strong v. Doty, 32 Wis. 381; Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 176.

If it be held that the parties intended that this timber should revert to the seller if not removed from the land in two years, even though severed from the soil and cut into logs within that time, then it must logically follow that no matter how its condition and character may be changed, still if upon the land the next day after the two years expired then it would revert to and be the property of the seller. This was not the intention of the parties. The rule would work great injustice and hence cannot be the law.

Pierrepont v. Barnard, 6 N. Y. 290, cited in 52 Mich. 369.

The contract was an absolute sale of the timber. The words as to removal constitute a covenant, and are not a condition subsequent, and the trial court was right and the judgment must be affirmed.

Green v. Bennett, 23 Mich. 470; Hicks v. Smith, 77 Wis. 146; Golden v. Glock, 57 Wis. 118, 46 Am. Rep. 32.

A tree is real property as long as it stands on its native soil, but when cut down it becomes subject to the laws of personal property.

Wescott v. Delano, 20 Wis. 515; Drake v. Wells, 11 Allen, 141; Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 488, 15 Am. Rep. 295; Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 86 Am. Dec. 173; White v. King, 87 Mich. 111; Spalding v. Archibald, 52 Mich. 368, 50 Am. Rep. 253.

To whom is this timber to revert if the language be deemed a condition? Not to the Cutler & Savage Lumber Company, for it has conveyed all of its interests; and not to Bissell, the grantee of the lumber company, as the right is not assignable.

Rice v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 12 Allen, 141; Guild v. Richards, 16 Gray, 309; Hooper v. Cummings, 45 Me. 359; Van Rensselaer v. Ball, 19 N. Y. 100; Nicoll v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 121.

Neither Bissell nor defendant company has any rights as bona fide purchasers without notice, as it is distinctly found that Bissell purchased and took possession of the land, knowing of the existence of the contract. The plaintiffs have the same rights as against this defendant or Bissell as they had against the lumber company.

Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 7; Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 523; Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 493.

If but a license it extended until July 22, 1894. The timber was cut before the expiration of the time, and if it be held to be a license it was more than a revocable license.

Ibid.

Such a license could not be revoked before the end of the two years.

Spalding v. Archibald, 52 Mich. 368, 50 Am. Rep. 353.

There is not only no decision which prevents the affirmance of this judgment, but the principle we contend for has already been announced.

Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 170; Green v. Bennett, 23 Mich. 464; Greeley v. Stilson, 27 Mich. 153; Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3; Russell v. Myers, 32 Mich. 524; Haskell v. Ayres, Id. 93, 35 Mich. 89; Utley v. Wilcox Lumber Co. 59 Mich. 263; Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 489; Wasey v. Mahoney, 55 Mich. 194; Prentiss v. Ross's Estate, 96 Mich. 83; Gamble v. Gates, 92 Mich. 510.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 22d day of July, 1892, the Cutler & Savage Lumber Company executed a writing to one John S. Wiedman, containing the following provisions: "The Cutler & Savage Lumber Company has this day sold to J. S. Wiedman, of Lake View, Michigan, all of the timber on the entire section 29, town 13 north, range 7 west. The said J. S. Wiedman is to remove the timber in two years from this date; and, in case the Cutler & Savage Lumber Company sell any of said land, the said J. S. Wiedman is to remove the timber from the land sold at once on being notified of said sale." On the 4th of November, 1892, Wiedman sold the same timber to plaintiff, and the lumber company afterwards sold the land to one Fred Bissell. No notice of this sale or request for immediate removal was made. Plaintiffs within the two years cut the pine in question into logs, but had not removed the logs from the premises within the two years. Bissell removed them, and defendant represents his title. The question is whether failure to remove the logs after they were cut, and within the two years named in the contract, forfeited the title. Contracts containing similar provisions have been construed in the courts in a number of the states, and the weight of authority supports the defendant's contention that, as to timber remaining uncut at the expiration of the time limited under a contract such as this, the title reverts to the owner of the realty. See Pease v. Gibson, 6 Me. 84; Howard v. Lincoln, 13 Me. 123; Saltonstall v. Little, 90 Pa. 422, 35 Am. Rep. 683; Utley v. Wilcox Lumber Co. 59 Mich. 263; Haskell v. Ayres, 32 Mich. 93, 35 Mich. 89; Gamble v. Gates. 92 Mich. 510.

None of the Michigan cases directly determine the status of timber cut and manufactured into logs during the time limited by such a contract as that in question, but not removed until later. In Gamble v Gates, the contract covered all the timber standing, lying, or being on the land. It was provided expressly that whatever of said timber shall remain on said lands after the limit afforded shall revert back, and become the property of the first party. The case was determined by the terms of the contract. In Golden v. Glock, 57 Wis. 118, 46 Am. Rep. 32, a contract similar to that in question was held to convey title to only such timber as was removed within the time limited, but considered all such timber as was manufactured into hoop poles as removed. In Hicks v. Smith, 77 Wis. 146, the same doctrine was reaffirmed by the same court. A contract not distinguishable from the one herein involved was considered, and it was held that, as to trees cut into logs, the severance from the realty had become complete. The property had become personalty, and its character so essentially changed by such manufacture that it was, in effect, removed from the premises, within the meaning of the deed. In Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 493, Mr. Chief Justice Campbell, speaking of such a contract as the present, said: "It is not very important to discuss the exact nature of plaintiff's rights under the written contract. Whatever they were, they included an absolute sale of all the timber described, subject only to such qualifications of the right of removal as the contract mentions. At most, this condition would only operate by way of forfeiture. The timber had all been paid for, and all belonged to plaintiff unless lost by that forfeiture for nonremoval." The same can be said of the present case, and, if we apply the rule that forfeitures are not favored (Miller v. Havens, 51 Mich. 485), the rule of the Wisconsin court seems consistent with reason and justice. It is no stretch to treat the severance of the timber from the soil, and its manufacture into logs, as a removal, within the terms of the provision for forfeiture. The case of Boisaubin v. Reed, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 161, is opposed to the Wisconsin cases cited; but we think the doctrine of the Wisconsin cases more just, and are disposed to adopt it.

Judgment affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

v.

William LIVINGSTONE, Jr. et al., Plffs. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Criticism of a book which is placed before the public is not libelous provided it does not include any misstatements of any material facts contained in the book or attack the character of the author.
2. To say that a writer quotes from another, without giving him credit when he encloses in quotation marks the passage quoted, does not charge him with plagiarism.
3. To call a remedy proposed by a book for poverty a "quack remedy" is not libelous.
4. Criticism, although severe and caustic, so long as it is directed to literary composition and theories, and not to the personal character of the author, is not libelous.

(February 18, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libelous review of a book written by plaintiff. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Plaintiff published a book entitled "The Wage Worker's Remedy," which was offered for sale to the public generally. The defendants are the publishers and owners of the Detroit Journal, a newspaper printed and published in the city of Detroit. Plaintiff took this book to the editorial room of the Journal and requested that it be reviewed. The book was handed by the managing editor to an employee for that purpose. A review was written and published May 15, 1894, and is as follows:

NOTE.—For criticism by expression of opinion as defamation, see note to St. James Military Academy v. Gaiser (Mo.) 28 L. R. A. 667.

"Mr. Dowling's Book,—The Wage Worker's Remedy.

"Morgan E. Dowling's little book, The Wage Worker's Remedy, is a well-meant, but rather hysterical, attempt to solve the labor question. Although utterly lacking scientific value, it is interesting to most Journal readers, because the author is a Detroit man, and because it reveals how the average mind is groping and floundering in the midst of a forest of contradictions and in swamps of bad logic to the discovery of the truth. We do not claim to know beyond question the right path, but feel sure that Mr. Dowling has hopelessly lost his way. In the first place, Mr. Dowling's view is entirely confined to this country. His wage worker is the American wage worker. This is mainly why his effort has no value as a contribution to economic science. What would be thought of a writer who tried to explain the law of the correlation of forces wholly from the American or French standpoint? The truths of political economy are, of course, world-wide, like all truth. Rent and interest and wages must rise and fall in the United States in obedience to the same eternal laws that govern them elsewhere. To think otherwise is to doubt the harmony and simplicity of God's rule. Bearing this in mind, one of the author's nine remedies for low wages and lack of employment is seen to be inadequate. For instance, he would suspend immigration to this country; yet Italy, Germany, and Poland, all having emmigration instead of immigration, and enjoying to a small degree some of his other remedies, are suffering from low wages. Ireland still seems to be too crowded, although, from famine and immigration, her population has been reduced one half in less than a century. Surely, France's low wages have not been caused in any way by immigration, and war and starvation and a low birth rate have kept her population within reasonable limits, almost to a standstill. Another of Mr. Dowling's remedies for low wages is government ownership of railways, street railways, telegraph lines, and telephones. This is funny. He doesn't stop to think, but disposes of the whole subject almost with one flourish. If he had stopped for even a moment, it might have occurred to him that wages were low before the telegraph and locomotive were known. In his hasty opinion, governmental operation of street cars would realize Mayor Pingree's dream of a three-cent fare, and that would lead to more travel, and hence to the employment of more men. There you are. The whole question of labor is solved! But electricity has displaced horses (outside Detroit); travel on street cars has doubled, and yet wages have fallen. We, of course, are using the word 'wages' in its strict economical sense, whereas Mr. Dowling for the moment has in mind only the wages of one set of men. The reduction of street-car fares, he says, would be equivalent to raising the wages of those wage workers who used the cars. Has he never thought of the influence of street-car improvements on rent? May it not be possible that the landowner, not the wage earner, would absorb the benefits of such improvements? We are not arguing against the restriction of immigration and governmental ownership and management of these natural monopolies. They may be desirable in themselves, but as a solution of the labor problem they are ridiculous. Mr. Dowling disclaims being a paternalist; yet he advocates the most astounding piece of socialistic policy. He inveighs against class legislation, and then proposes some legislation of that kind. He would have the government forbid a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent and a lower rate of wages than $2 a day. Such childish suggestions were bad enough in the Middle Ages, when the laws of political economy were unknown. An old king commanded the tide to recede, and an English parliament undertook to fix a maximum wage. Both were excusable, for they were ignorant. We know better to-day. Like the tide, wages follow certain unchangeable laws. The old king might have erected a stone wall against the tide, but the tide would have gone on working just the same, until it overflowed the obstruction or undermined it or pushed it over. So the law of wages does not cease to operate when artificial obstructions are placed in the way of its sweep. Something may fall and smash, but it will not be the fault of the economic law. The law itself is all right, being the will of the Creator, and any patchwork by the finite mind cannot but lead to bad results. Mr. Dowling simply does not understand what 'wages' are, in the meaning given to the word by political economy. He has constantly in mind the meaning of the word as applied to 'wage-earners.' In political economy, however, the meaning of the word 'wages' is broader. It is the return for any service or for any productive labor. Thus, many are their own employers, and receive as wages what they themselves produce. How could the legislature compel an express-wagon driver or a small market gardener or a small shopkeeper to pay himself at least $2 a day? The merchant is both a capitalist and a wage earner, as political economy regards him. His profits are made up of interest on his capital, and of wages of superintendence. He may have, let us say, fifty clerks employed, at an average rate of $1.50 a day. The law suddenly compels him, according to Mr. Dowling's scheme, to pay them not less than $2 a day, increasing his expenses $25 a day. He is himself a laborer, a wage worker, as truly as are his clerks, and nine times out of ten a harder and more anxious worker, for upon him rests responsibility, and the shame should failure come. His own wages may already be cut down fearfully by high rent and competition; yet Mr. Dowling would arbitrarily make him pay higher wages to his clerks than the labor market required. Of course, like all quack remedies, it would intensify the trouble if it had any effect at all. Besides trickery and lying, it would cause business failures and the employment relatively of less clerks. The tide might be dammed up for a moment, but its strength would be felt. About one third of Mr. Dowling's book is devoted to praising Henry George, and to refuting his ideas. In the opening chapter he quotes from George without giving him credit, and outdoes him in raising alarm over present social conditions, even saying that revolution is at hand unless something is quickly done to appease the wrathful and wronged masses. In the last chapter he has apparently cooled off, forgotten his alarm, and believes that material progress tends to benefit all. One wonders what he made such a fuss for first, especially when it is found that he believes that some poverty is bound to exist anyway. He says Henry George's scheme is socialistic, and then he proposes an extension of governmental powers which would make Sam Goldwater happy. He denounces the single-tax scheme as robbery, and then advocates it, at least so far as it is applied in New Zealand. He would exempt improvements largely, and tax land values so high as to prevent speculation in land, which is all any single taxer dares to hope will be accomplished in a generation or two to come. After giving his program of nine remedies, Mr. Dowling thinks of many more. He would prohibit the acquirement of more land by any man than is actually needed by him for business or homestead purposes. This is pretty strong for one who has just been defending the institution of private property in land as all right, and it hasn't the merit of originality, for Horace Greeley advocated the same thing fifty years ago. It is altogether an amusing book, as full of contradictions and absurdities as a schoolboy of tricks. Mr. Dowling gravely assures the reader that the remedy for poverty is 'steady work, shorter hours, and fair wages.' He might have added that food is an excellent remedy for hunger. 'The Wage Worker's Remedy' is on sale at Hunt & Eaton's, 189 Woodward Ave."

The defendants, with their plea, gave notice that they would insist in their defense that they had the right, and that it was their duty, to justly and fairly criticise such book, and that the criticism complained of is a just and fair one, and was published without malice or intention to injure said plaintiff. Two questions are presented: (1) Is the article libelous? (2) If so, what is the measure of damages?

Messrs. Cutcheon, Stellwagen, & Fleming, for plaintiffs in error:

The article is not libelous. It in no way attacks plaintiff personally. It does not attack his business. It is nothing but a discussion of a book which was offered for review. It contains nothing but the opinion of one writer about a book written by another.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, 4th ed. pp. 450, 451, 463, 464.

That publication is not to be considered a libel which has for its object, not to injure the reputation of anyone, but to correct misrepresentations of fact, to refute sophistical reasoning to expose a vicious taste in literature, or to censure what is hostile to morality.

Scripps v. Reilly, supra; Farrand v. Aldrich, 85 Mich. 604.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The propositions advocated by the plaintiff are thus stated in the second chapter of his book: "(1) The suspension of all immigration to this country. (2) The making of eight hours a legal day's work. (3) The prohibition of marriage under the age of twenty-one years. (4) The prohibition of the employment of children under fifteen years of age in workshops, factories, and mines. (5) The fixing of the minimum rate of wages at $2 per day for all laborers, except domestic and farm laborers. (6) The reduction of the legal rate of interest to 4 per cent per annum. (7) The purchase of all street railways, and the placing of them under the control and management of the municipal authorities. (8) The purchase of all telegraph, telephone, and railroad lines in the United States, and the placing of them under the control and management of the national government. (9) The prohibition of the purchase of lands in this country by nonresident aliens, and the compelling of all nonresident aliens who now own lands to sell them within a specified time, or forfeit their titles." The book is mainly devoted to a discussion and elucidation of these propositions. No malice was shown on the part of the defendants, unless it is fairly deducible from the article itself. On the contrary, it appears to be conclusively established that the defendants did not entertain any malice towards him, and that the book was placed by them in the hands of their critic, who wrote the article, without any comment or instruction.

When an author places his book before the public, he invites criticism; and, however hostile that criticism may be, and however much damage it may cause him by preventing its sale, the critic is not liable in an action for libel, provided he makes no misstatement of any material facts contained in the writing, and does not attack the character of the author. The book and the criticism are both before the public. The language we used in Belknap v. Ball, 83 Mich. 589, 11 L. R. A. 72, applies to this case: "When language is truthfully stated the criticism thereon, if unjust, will fall harmless, for the former furnishes a ready antidote for the intended poison. Readers can then determine whether the writer has by the publication libeled himself or the candidate. When the language is falsely and maliciously stated privilege ceases to constitute a defense." We think that case and the authorities there cited establish the principle governing this. Townshend states the rule as follows: "As criticism is opinion, it can never be primarily material to inquire into its justness. The right to criticise implies the right to judge for one's self of the justness of the criticism. It would seem to be but a delusion to say one has the right to criticise, provided the criticism be just. The justness or unjustness can never be more than matter of opinion. The test always is, Was the criticism bona fide? It is like the case of one writing concerning the sanity of another; the test of the justification is not, Was the statement such as a man of sound sense would have made? but, Was it the honest conviction of the publisher?" (p. 464). The case of Bacon v. Michigan C. R. Co. 66 Mich. 166, has no application to this case. No question of criticism of an author's writing was there involved. The defendant had reported the plaintiff as having been discharged from its employ for stealing. The report was a direct attack upon his personal character. There is in both reason and authority a wide distinction between language uttered concerning a person and criticism of his writings. Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 255. It was said in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 Fost. & F. 428: "The article, no doubt, is pungent, bitter, and caustic; at the same time public men, and, above all, public writers, must not complain if they are sometimes rather roughly treated. Public writers, who expose themselves to criticism, must not complain that such criticism is sometimes hostile. . . . It was perfectly lawful for a public writer to say that it was an idle scheme, and that it was a delusion to suppose that by forcing these papers [meaning the plaintiff's newspapers] into circulation by free distribution the great cause of missions would be promoted, and, in short, to denounce the whole scheme as pernicious and delusive." In a note to the above case will be found cited several English cases sustaining the rule. See also Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 254. It is not libelous to ridicule literary composition. Carr v. Hood, 1 Campb. 355, note. Lord Ellenborough in that case said: "One writer in exposing the follies and errors of another may make use of ridicule, however poignant. Ridicule is often the fittest weapon that can be employed for such a purpose. If the reputation or pecuniary interests of the person ridiculed suffer, it is damnum absque injuria. Where is the liberty of the press if an action can be maintained on such principles? . . . Every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public, and anyone may comment upon his performance. If the commentator does not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation, he exercises a fair and legitimate right."

It is unnecessary to cite or quote further from the authorities. The rule of law in such cases is clear. In applying it to the present case, we find that the personal character and reputation of the author are not attacked. His theories are. In no material matter is there any misstatement of fact or of the propositions set forth in the book. The critic was at liberty to attack or denounce them with sarcasm and ridicule.

The learned circuit judge instructed the jury that "the defendants had the right to ridicule this book if, in the candid judgment of any fair man, the book or any part of it deserved ridicule." This is not the law. As already shown, when the critic correctly states the author, he (the critic) is the sole judge of the language of his criticism. Many fair men might disagree with him, and very likely would in this case. This is for the public, and not for a jury, to determine. If the plaintiff's contention be the correct rule of law, then the protectionist might maintain an action for libel against the free trader who attacks his protection theories and arguments with sarcasm, ridicule, and contempt.

Plaintiff insists that the defendants charged him with plagiarism, because he did not give Henry George credit for a quotation from his works. The quotation was inclosed in quotation marks, but not credited to Mr. George, and the court very properly charged the jury that this did not charge him with plagiarism.

The court also correctly instructed the jury that it was not libelous to call his remedy a "quack remedy."

It was not libelous to say that "Horace Greeley advocated the prohibition of the acquirement of more land by a man than is actually needed by him for his business or homestead purposes," even though it should appear that Mr. Greeley had not advocated such a doctrine.

Complaint is also made of the statement that "he [plaintiff] denounces the single-tax scheme as robbery." In that part of the book to which this statement has reference, plaintiff is discussing the single-tax theory of Mr. George, and is denouncing his proposition to take the land from the present owners without compensation, which he denounces as "a gigantic piece of robbery." As stated in the book, this was a part of the single-tax theory of Mr. George. The article complained of, however, correctly states the position of the plaintiff upon this subject.

The declaration contains no innuendoes, and, although the criticism is undoubtedly severe and caustic, it does not exceed the bounds of legitimate criticism. The court should have directed a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Joseph ATKINS et al., Appts.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Affidavits for a change of the place of trial because a fair trial cannot be had in the county cannot, by denying that such a trial can be had in certain other counties, prevent the judge from exercising his right under the statute to act on his own personal knowledge in sending the case to an adjacent county or some other county most convenient, in which the court is of opinion that a fair and impartial trial may be had.

2. A statute permitting the denial of a continuance in a criminal case for absent witnesses for the defendant, provided the prosecuting attorney will admit that the witnesses if present would testify as alleged in the affidavits, is not in violation of the constitutional right of the defendant to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses or the right to meet witnesses face to face (which means witnesses against him), where he has had reasonable time and opportunity to obtain his witnesses by compulsory process of the law, but such reasonable time and opportunity must be given him.

3. Filing indictments against witnesses to prove an alibi based solely on evidence of witnesses for the prosecution, in the presence of persons summoned to serve as jurors in the trial of the case, is improper as not calculated to give the accused a fair and impartial trial.

4. The discretion of the circuit court to order into actual custody a defendant in a criminal trial which has commenced cannot be restricted by a previous allowance of bail by a county judge.

(January 16, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County sentencing them to imprisonment for murder of which they had been found guilty. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Breckinridge & Shelby, for appellants:

The Knox county court was without jurisdiction in this case, and the order of the Perry circuit court transferring the case was void.

Ky. Stat. § 1110; Higgins v. Com. 94 Ky. 57.

NOTE.—For denial of continuance upon admissions by the prosecution, as affected by right of accused to meet witnesses, see note to Hoyt v. People (Ill.) 16 L. R. A. 239.

A refusal to continue a criminal case when the defendant was entitled thereto might be of itself a sufficient cause for reversal.

Morgan v. Com. 14 Bush, 106; Salisbury v. Com. 79 Ky. 425; White v. Com. 80 Ky. 489; Petty v. Com. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 920; Bowlin v. Com. 94 Ky. 394; Vogt v. Com. 92 Ky. 71; Murphy v. Com. 92 Ky. 488; Hardesty v. Com. 88 Ky. 541.

The fair construction of § 189 of the Criminal Code is, that was the trial term.

Pace v. Com. 89 Ky. 206.

The amendment to the Code of 1886 is not constitutional.

Pace v. Com. 89 Ky. 207.

The judgment of the judge of the county court of Knox county deciding that the prisoners were entitled to bail was as final as if made by the circuit judge, and his order admitting them to bail had the same legal effect.

Smith v. Com. 91 Ky. 588; White v. Com. 80 Ky. 480.

Messrs. B. B. Golden, C. Bowers, C. B. Lyttle, J. C. Forrester, and John L. Scott & Son also for appellants.

Mr. William J. Hendrick for appellee.

Grace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by Joseph Atkins and Jesse Fields from a judgment of the Knox circuit court sentencing each of them to confinement in the state penitentiary for life, for the murder of Josiah Combs. The killing occurred in Hazard, the county seat of Perry county, on the 23d day of September, 1894; same being Sunday and about 7 o'clock in the morning. Indictment against these defendants was duly found by the grand jury of Perry county on the 13th day of December, 1894. And on the same day, and on motion of the commonwealth, for the removal of the cause to another county, was made, accompanied by the written statement of the commonwealth's attorney, in due form, that the state of lawlessness was such in Perry county that a fair trial of the accused on said charge could not be had in that county. This motion was not opposed by the accused, but pending same they filed a joint affidavit saying that they had been participants in what was known as the "French Eversole feud," that had been going on in Perry county and (naming) ten other counties, including the county of Knox, and that the state of public opinion against them, among the masses of the people, relations, and friends of the Eversole faction and J. M. Combs, in the counties named, was such that they did not believe they could have a fair trial in either of said counties. This affidavit was supported by the joint affidavit of three other persons, who simply say that they are acquainted with the facts stated in the foregoing affidavit, and that they believe them to be true. Upon this state of the record, the court made an order removing the cause to the county of Knox for trial, and to this order defendants excepted. And when the case was called in Knox county for trial, and before entering their plea of not guilty in said court, they objected to the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Knox county, and moved that "said cause be remanded to the circuit court of Perry county, to be again assigned." This motion was overruled by the court.

It will be noticed that by the statute, passed in pursuance of the constitutional authority, for the removal of causes by the commonwealth, when the commonwealth's attorney has filed his statement showing the necessity of the removal, "the court may then act on its own personal knowledge in the removal of the cause, either to some adjacent county, or yet to some other county most convenient, and in which the court is of opinion that a fair and impartial trial may be had." In the order removing this case, the court recites that, so acting on its own personal knowledge, it removed the case to the county of Knox, "as being the most convenient county for the trial of same in which this state of lawlessness did not exist." In this removal the court was authorized so to act, and was not bound by the affidavit of the accused, though supported by the other affidavit, in objecting to the county of Knox. The objection of the accused to the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Knox county was properly overruled.

The Knox circuit court began on the 2d Monday in April, 1895. This cause seems to have been set for the 4th day of the term. The commonwealth announced "Ready." The defendants were not ready, and, being required, they filed an affidavit setting out the absence of some twenty-five witnesses by whom they could prove important and material facts chiefly relating to an alibi in behalf of both parties; showing that in March, before, they had procured a subpœna for the witnesses, and placed same in the hands of the sheriff of Breathitt county, where said witnesses resided; counsel for defendants saying to the court that they did not desire a continuance of the cause for the term, provided they could obtain the attendance of these witnesses at a later day of the court. Thereupon the court set said cause for hearing on the 10th day of the term. And upon the representation of the accused that they were poor, and that their witnesses were poor, and had not the means to pay passage from Breathitt county, where they lived to Knox county, the court made an order directing that these witnesses should be summoned and arrested on behalf of the commonwealth, and brought to court. This warrant of arrest, however, was never issued, and never in fact sent to the sheriff of Breathitt county. But, as is shown by an affidavit in the cause, the judge of the court—not in open court, but at night, and at the instance of the attorneys for the prosecution, and without the knowledge or consent of the accused or their counsel—appointed one Burton, a witness for the commonwealth, and one Mann, a resident of Breathitt county, as special bailiffs to execute this process. It appears from the affidavit of Burton that on going to Jackson, the county seat of Breathitt, he found Mann, and had him duly sworn, and that then, having an arrangement with Marcum to furnish tickets by railroad to such witnesses as they might obtain, they summoned for the defendants thirteen witnesses; that, of these, three were sick, and the family of another was sick, but that they did in this way have present, at the time and place agreed on with Marcum, nine of the witnesses of the defense, but that Marcum failed to appear and furnish the transportation as he had agreed to do. And the special bailiff says, that, having no money himself to pay the fare of the witnesses, and the day of trial approaching, he did not place the witnesses under arrest, but abandoned them, and returned to court to make his report; that only a single witness was secured by this arrangement.

On the calling of the cause on the 10th day of the term, the attorney for the commonwealth again announced "Ready," and the defendants, "Not ready;" and being required by the court again to show cause, they filed another affidavit, reciting the absence of some twenty-seven witnesses, the materiality of whose evidence in their defense was duly set forth together with the facts developed in their efforts to procure their attendance since the former calling of the cause, as recited herein. And defendants again asked a continuance. Upon an examination of this last affidavit, the commonwealth's attorney agreed that the same might be read upon the trial of the cause as the testimony of the absent witnesses; the counsel for accused insisting, if compelled to try on this affidavit, that the state should admit absolutely as true, the facts stated in this affidavit. This the court overruled. Exceptions were duly taken, and the court overruled the motion for a continuance. Exceptions were duly taken. Thereupon an examination of jurors, touching their competency, commenced, and five being obtained who were qualified, but not finally passed upon or accepted, an adjournment was had until the next morning. Whereupon, on the assembling of the court next day, defendants offered to file an additional and amended affidavit reaffirming the one filed the day before, and setting forth in their amended paper quite a number of (some sixteen) witnesses not before presented to the court and whose testimony they said they had discoverd since the filing of their former affidavit. Most of the witnesses named in this amended affidavit lived in and near Hazard, the place of the killing. "And by the testimony of six, at least, of them, defendants say they can prove such facts as will clearly show that five of the six or seven witnesses for the commonwealth who will undertake to identify Joseph Atkins as the man who did the shooting, and some of whom identify Fields as the man who was present at the time, were not in fact present at the time of this shooting, and that they did not and could not possibly have seen, at the time and place they claim to have seen, the person who did this shooting." So clearly and distinctly is this evidence embraced in this amended affidavit opposed to the testimony of the witnesses who testify for the commonwealth to the killing, that their materiality cannot for a moment be questioned. If the testimony as contained in this amended paper offered is true, then it greatly impairs the most important and direct testimony of the witnesses for the commonwealth who testify to the killing, and who undertake to identify Atkins and Fields as the parties who participated in same. Quite a number of the witnesses named in the last paper, it is said, will contradict testimony of commonwealth's witnesses tending to connect these defendants with the killing, and same are clearly contradictory of the evidence of the commonwealth, as afterwards appears in the trial. No inconsiderable part of the testimony of the commonwealth tending to identify Atkins and Fields consisted of evidence of certain parties who went in pursuit of the parties who did the shooting, and who claimed that, in a fight with said parties on that day, two of them shot and wounded Fields, and at the same time claimed to recognize Atkins as being with Fields in the fight; and yet by an examination made only two days later, by the friends of Combs, who was killed, of the person of Fields, it was clearly shown that he had not been wounded at all. In this amended paper it was stated that the reason that neither of the defendants had been to Hazard since this killing to hunt up evidence in their behalf, and to prepare their cause, was that the state of feeling against them in that town and county was such that their lives would have been endangered, and that this occasion was the first opportunity they had to obtain this information. This affidavit was full in other respects as required by law. The court refused to permit the defendants to file this affidavit, or to give the accused, in any way, any benefit of the evidence contained in same,—again refusing to continue the cause. During the day, further progress was made in obtaining a jury, but it was not completed, accepted, or sworn, and the court again adjourned over until the next day.

On the morning of the next day, defendants offered to file a fourth affidavit, in which they, still relying upon their former affidavits, say that "it is manifest that the testimony to be heard in the case will be extremely conflicting and contradictory, and that the personal presence of their witnesses is highly important, and that since the calling of this case on the tenth day of the term, the witnesses for the prosecution, conspiring together to intimidate and prevent the attendance of the witnesses for defendants, have procured by false testimony before the grand jury, the indictment of some of these witnesses for false swearing or perjury, by reason of the testimony formerly given by them before the county judge of Knox county on a motion for bail, and that one of same (Patton), the only one who was obtained by the special bailiff out of the whole twenty-five whom he was ordered to arrest, has been so indicted, and, in open court, and in the presence of the jury then approved, arrested on said charge; that they are refused access to or knowledge of these indictments against their witnesses. Cannot tell against whom nor how many are indicted, but they say that, in all this, a fair and impartial trial is obstructed and denied these defendants." On tendering this paper, the defendants again moved a continuance. The court refused to permit same to be filed, and again overruled the motion to continue the cause. It is proper to add that, of the witnesses for the defense from Breathitt county who were relied upon by them to prove an alibi, ten finally appeared, and testified to a state of facts which, if true, showed it was impossible that either of the accused (Atkins or Fields) could have been in Hazard, Perry county, Sunday morning, September 23, 1894, when the shooting and killing of Combs occurred; this testimony showing the accused to have then been in Breathitt county, thirty miles away from Hazard, at the hour of the shooting of Combs. And finally it appears under the affidavit which the accused did file, and the statements of which the commonwealth consented, to prevent a continuance, might be read as evidence, that the statements of thirteen other witnesses were read on this same matter of an alibi; that these statements were given with great detail and circumstance of time and place, and showing conclusively, if true, that the accused could not have been in Hazard, Perry county, at the time of the killing of Josiah Combs.

Counsel for the defendants contend earnestly that in all this proceeding their clients have, by this combination of circumstances,—one of the affidavits filed showing the absence of their chief attorney, who was acquainted with all the facts of the case,—and by the rulings of the court, been deprived of a fair and impartial trial; that they have not been allowed a reasonable opportunity to prepare their defense in a case of such grave magnitude to them. And particularly do counsel complain that their clients have not been awarded that compulsory process of the law to compel the attendance of their witnesses, as guaranteed under the Bill of Rights (a part of the Constitution of the state) to every person accused of crime; that their clients have not been accorded any reasonable opportunity for the operation and execution of such compulsory process, as provided by the supreme law of the land; that instead of this process, which, under the law, should have gone to the sheriff of Breathitt county, same was not so awarded, but that in disregard of this law, and as a substitute therefor, a special bailiff was appointed by the judge of the court, at the instance of the attorneys employed to assist the commonwealth in their prosecution (and which was so ordered without their knowledge or consent). And while counsel do not question the good faith of the court in making this special order, yet they say the utter failure of which process to the special bailiff was due to the failure of one of the attorneys for the commonwealth to furnish the transportation as he agreed to do (all this is shown by the affidavit of the special bailiff in the record, and remains unexplained); and that, finally, they were forced into trial without the personal attendance of many of their material witnesses, and, as to some of them, compelled to try without any benefit whatever of their testimony, and, as to others, only on the admission by the commonwealth that the affidavits should be read as the testimony of the absent witnesses, and not upon the condition that the statements should be taken as true.

Counsel question the constitutionality of the act of 1886 in reference to the trial of criminal cases, whereby this proceeding is made possible under the Code. Counsel say that this question has often been presented to this court, but not decided; and they insist in this case that it is due to their clients, as well as to the trial courts of the state, and to the profession, that it should be determined.

The provision upon which counsel rely is found in the 11th section of the Bill of Rights, adopted as a part of the present Constitution of Kentucky, and is as follows: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused has the right to be heard by himself and counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to meet the witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." These are substantially the same provisions on this subject as contained in the old Constitution of Kentucky. Under our Criminal Code, adopted soon after that Constitution went into operation, it was provided (§ 188): "That when an indictment is called for trial, or at any time previous thereto, the court upon sufficient cause shown by either party may direct the trial to be postponed to any time in the same term, or to another term." And by § 189: "That the provisions of the Code of Practice in civil actions in regard to the postponement of the trial of actions, shall apply to the postponement of [criminal] prosecutions on application of defendant, except that, when the ground of application for a continuance is the absence of a material witness, and the defendant makes affidavit as to the facts which such witness would prove, the continuance shall be granted, unless the attorney for the commonwealth admits upon the trial that the facts are true. These provisions found in the Code of 1854 became the rule of practice in the trial courts, and, from time to time, it was, either by implication or directly, approved by the court. And in the case of Pace v. Com. 89 Ky. 206–209, this court expressly affirmed the constitutionality of that act. And such continued to be the law and rule of practice in criminal cases up to May, 1886. During all these years it became manifest that the rule requiring the state to admit as absolutely true whatever the accused might, by his ex parte affidavit, say he could prove by an absent witness, materially impaired the execution of the criminal law; that by its operation it was placed in the power of an unscrupulous criminal, aided by expert and ingenious counsel, to long and indefinitely delay the trial of his cause, or else to compel the state to admit facts, for the purpose of a trial, which often, in effect, were equivalent to a verdict of acquittal. In this way, and by the operation of this provision, the criminal law was brought into disrepute, and by many held in contempt, and the court and officers of the law censured for the long delay, and final failure, of justice. To remedy this crying evil, the legislature, in 1886, amended the provisions of the Code of 1854 in reference to the terms on which the state might procure a trial of criminal causes, and provided that the state might demand a trial, at any term of the court after the one at which the indictment was found, by admitting, not that the facts claimed by the accused that he could prove by any absent witness were true, but by admitting that, if such witness was present and testifying, he would state the facts as claimed by the accused in his affidavit; this latter amendment, however, still containing a provision that the court might, in its discretion, where the ends of justice seemed to require it, compel the attorney for the commonwealth to admit the truth of the statements contained in the affidavit of the accused. This amendment of 1886 also contained further clauses authorizing the state to contradict the statements of the affidavit by other testimony, and to impeach the absent witnesses by whom it was claimed such testimony would be given. This law has been the rule of practice in the circuit courts of the state since its enactment. It is conceded that its provisions are widely different, and make a material modification of the Code of 1854 on this subject. It may be also observed of this new provision that, in practice, it has been found a great improvement upon the old law, in that it enables the state, in a reasonable time, to force a trial of its indictments, notwithstanding the continued and persistent efforts of the accused to delay and continue. We call to mind no provision of the Criminal Code that has been found so valuable, and of such material aid to accomplish a speedy trial, as that contained in this amendment. In our experience, drawn from the many records of criminal trials brought before us, as well as in our own personal observation, men do not commit crimes that they may be punished, or for the sake of the punishment affixed by law, but from motives of malice, in obedience to, or to gratify, some unlawful passion, or for purposes of gain by force or fraud.

Yet the question remains whether this amendment of 1886 is constitutional. Of the provisions of the Bill of Rights, § 11, before quoted, as applicable to this case, we have two clauses,—one affirming the right of a person accused of crime to meet the witnesses face to face (of course, this means the witnesses that may be called by the state against him). The other provision is that the accused shall have the right to "the compulsory process of the state for obtaining witnesses in his favor." The one provision is equally as authoritative, as clear, and its meaning as obvious, as the other. No effort has ever been made by the legislature to impair in any degree the efficiency of the first clause quoted,—"That accused shall have the right to meet the witnesses [called against him] face to face." We apprehend that no such effort would be tolerated by the courts. And yet this § 11 of the Bill of Rights by no means contains the whole law applicable to the Criminal Code of the state. It is easily, fairly, and clearly deducible from the Constitution that it is the first and highest duty of a state to its citizens to preserve the public peace, and by its laws, and through its courts and law officers, to afford full, complete, and ample protection to all its citizens in life and limb, reputation and property. This is the very foundation stone of its authority and right to exist as a government at all. This end can only be accomplished, First, by the enactment by the legislative power of appropriate laws for the protection of its citizens, to which should be annexed appropriate penalties for violation of the same; and, second, by the courts, in faithfully and diligently enforcing these laws and punishments. It is well argued by text writers and courts that it is the certainty of punishment that deters bad men from the commission of crime. So that we find that the provisions of § 11 of the Constitution, under consideration, is but a part of the whole. It is but a provision in behalf of one accused of crime to have the process of the state to compel the attendance of his witnesses. And yet the question is presented whether this provision shall override and dominate every other duty of the state to the citizen. Whether, after the compliance with this provision of the Constitution, in awarding to the accused the compulsory process of the state, wherein and whereby is given reasonable time and opportunity for the execution of the same, and yet, after all this has been done, and the actual attendance of every possible witness failed to be obtained, what shall then be done? Shall the accused be discharged without trial, and, of course, without punishment, or shall the legislature make some other and further provision applicable to that state of case? It did undertake to make such further provision, by the Code of 1854, in allowing the state a trial upon admitting as true the facts stated by accused that he could prove by absent witnesses. This provision, having, on a fair trial, been found highly detrimental, if not subversive of the whole Criminal Code, was by the amendment of 1886, under consideration, abandoned, and a different mode adopted by the legislative will. This consists, as we have seen, in only requiring the state to admit that the absent witnesses, if present, would testify as claimed in the affidavit. On the face of the acts in question, neither of them, either in letter or spirit, violates the provisions of the Constitution. They are but an expression of the legislative will as to what shall be the rule of procedure by the courts on a state of case where the accused, having had awarded him this compulsory process of the state to obtain the attendance of his witnesses, and having been allowed a reasonable time and opportunity to enforce this writ, yet, on the calling of his cause for trial, finds himself without the actual presence of all the witnesses whom he desires. In this state of case the amendment of 1886, under consideration, provides that the state may have a trial if the prosecuting attorney will admit to be read, as the evidence of the absent witnesses, the affidavit filed by the accused. Either act, viewed and interpreted and administered so as to substitute the provisions of either for the constitutional guaranty to the accused of the compulsory process of the state, with reasonable time and opportunity for the execution of the same, would be bad. But neither provision, either of the Code of 1854, or of the amendment in question of 1886, is bad, construed and enforced in the light of the interpretation herein indicated. And this we think is the true meaning and interpretation of the clause in the Constitution before quoted, and of the amendment of 1886 to the Code. In adopting this construction, the prisoner is deprived of no right guaranteed to him by the Constitution. And the state is also, by this amendment of 1886, enabled to obtain a trial within a reasonable time, and thus give to all her citizens the benefit of the laws enacted for their security and protection.

Reviewing this case in the light of this interpretation, and upon the facts disclosed by the record, we feel constrained to say that the accused have not, in the trial of this case, had awarded them the compulsory process of the law, with reasonable time and opportunity to obtain the benefit of same. And for this reason the judgment of conviction, as to both appellants, Atkins and Fields, is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Knox circuit court for further proceedings therein not inconsistent with the principles of this opinion.

We might add that we do not view with approval the filing of indictments by the grand jury of Knox county, based solely on the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution in the criminal case under trial, against the witnesses of the defendants who had theretofore testified to facts showing, in behalf of the accused, an alibi. The filing of same in the presence of those summoned to serve as jurors in the trial of the murder case was not calculated to give to the accused that fair and impartial trial contemplated by law.

Many other objections are made by counsel for appellants on this appeal, but, outside of the matters indicated, we find the record substantially correct, and free from error. The case needed no other evidence to authorize the submission of the conspiracy between these parties and others to do the deed than the evidence tending to identify them as the persons actually present and participating and tending to identify them as the parties found in the woods a few miles away, and with whom the posse claims to have had an encounter. That there was yet a third man stationed on the hill opposite the town, who participated in the firing on Combs, or at least at the time of his killing, seems to be conceded. This third man might well correspond to one of the three men found in the woods by the posse.

The court seems to have kept steadily in view the principle heretofore announced by this court, that evidence tending to connect the accused with the faction adverse to the Combs people must be of a general nature only, and that it was not proper for either party to go into the particulars of any transaction. And, further, the court warned the jury that the evidence admitted on this line could only be considered by them as supplying a possible motive for the commission of the offense with which they now stand charged.

Neither was it necessary for the court, all through the trial (where the defendants were being tried together), to be constantly warning the jury that this or that particular evidence was either to be considered only against or in favor of one or the other of the accused. The jury may be fairly supposed to possess sufficient intelligence to distinguish and apply the evidence properly.

Another matter complained of is that the court, on entering upon the trial, disregarded the order of the county judge of Knox county, previously made, allowing bail; held the bond taken bad on its face, as not being taken by the proper officer; and then ordered the defendants into actual custody. There was no error in all this. It would be a strange perversion of the law if a county judge could dictate to a circuit judge what course he should pursue in the trial of one charged with felony in his court. It was within the discretion of the court to order defendants into actual custody when the trial commenced. Neither should the order of the county judge heretofore made have any effect, or be regarded of any validity, if the prisoners desire to again give bail. New proceedings for this purpose will be necessary, before the proper officer.

We mention these things only because questions of a similar nature may again arise in any future trial of the defendants. And, as this cause must go back for a retrial, we have carefully refrained from expressing any opinion as to the merits of the case on the evidence. This is purely and exclusively a question for the jury to determine. The motion by the commonwealth to strike the bill of exceptions from the record is overruled.

Judgment reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth BOYER, Appt.,
v.

(160 Ill. 394.)

1. A mortgage securing a principal sum and interest coupons may be foreclosed to raise the amount due on coupons as they fall due, without affecting its security for the principal and other coupons.

2. Holders of the principal note and interest coupons not due are not necessary parties to a suit to foreclose the mortgage to raise the amount due on matured interest coupons, if the lien of the mortgage in favor of the other notes is to be left unimpaired.

3. Possession by the holder of an unrecorded contract for a block of flats, of one of the flats in the building, is sufficient notice to preserve his rights as to a person subsequently taking a mortgage from the vendor.

(January 20, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant Elizabeth Boyer from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County subordinating her to the rights of Emily Elliott an intervener in a proceeding by plaintiffs to foreclose a mortgage given by George R. Allen. Affirmed.

Statement by the COURT:

On April 1, 1892, one George R. Allen executed his deed of trust to Frank R. Chandler on lot 23 in a certain subdivision of a tract of land in Chicago, to secure his promissory note, of even date therewith, for $3,500, payable to Allen's own order, maturing five years after date, and bearing interest at 6 per cent payable NOTE.—The present case seems to be a novel one in respect to the right of the holders of coupon interest notes to foreclose a mortgage securing them; but the general subject of the rights of bondholders to enforce a mortgage securing their bonds is the subject of a note to Seibert v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (Minn.) 20 L. R. A. 535.

semi-annually on the 1st days of April and October in each year until paid, evidenced by ten coupon notes of $105 each. The deed of trust provided that it was given for the security of the payment of all said notes, without priority or preference, and that, in case of default in payment for ten days, the whole of the principal sum should at once, at the option of the holder of any one of said notes, become due. The notes were indorsed by Allen, the maker and payee thereof. Peyton Chandler and Frank R. Chandler, partners, became the owners of the first, second, and third of said coupons, and, default being made in the payment, they thereupon on October 28, 1893, filed this bill in the circuit court of Cook county, against Allen and others, defendants, to foreclose the mortgage. Elizabeth Boyer, the holder of the second mortgage given by Allen on the same lot, for the sum of $1,500, payable to her two years after date, was made a party defendant. This last note was secured by a deed of trust given by Allen to Henry F. Vallette, trustee. On April 11, 1892, Emily Elliott, one of the defendants, made a written agreement with said Allen for the purchase of the lot in question, subject to the Chandler deed of trust of $3,500, and he was to convey the same to Mrs. Elliott within twenty days. Allen, also, by said agreement, was to erect a three-story flat building on the lot by July 1, 1892. He was to retain the premises, and use of the first and second floors for thirty weeks from July 1, 1892, without rent. Mrs. Elliott failed to record this agreement. Allen completed the building, but not in the time fixed. Mrs. Elliott, in October, 1892, took possession of the third flat, and held the same until September, 1893; and Allen rented the other two flats to certain persons, who occupied the same. During the occupancy of Mrs. Elliott, Allen procured the loan of $4,500, subject to the Chandler loan of $3,500, from Mrs. Boyer, who claims to have made the loan in ignorance of Mrs. Elliott's equities and her contract of purchase, and, therefore, that she is entitled to priority over Mrs. Elliott. Mrs. Elliott on March 6, 1894, filed her cross bill, in which the contract with Allen was set out, with the attendant facts. Upon the final hearing the court decreed that the Vallette trust deed, and the rights of appellant, Boyer, were subject to the rights of Mrs. Elliott under her contract with Allen, and her possession of the premises. From this decree Mrs. Boyer brings the case to this court.

Messrs. Vallette & Hall, for appellant:

Appellant did not have notice of the interest of Emily Elliott at the time of the execution and delivery of the trust deed from Allen to Vallette.

All deeds and title papers shall be adjudged void as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers without due notice, until the same shall be filed for record.

Per Curiam:

The complainants below, the Chandlers, by their bill, sought to foreclose the deed of trust given by George R Allen to them, as to the three first coupon or interest notes. It is not sought to affect or lessen the security as to the principal note and the two remaining coupon notes. The holder of a note due is not required to wait until the other notes secured by the same mortgage are due before he takes steps to enforce his security. In Morgenstern v. Klees, 30 Ill. 422, the bill proceeded for a foreclosure of unpaid interest on the mortgage debt. The court said: "The practice is too well settled, to require discussion, or reference to authority, that where a mortgage is given to secure sums of money falling due at different periods, the creditor may foreclose by bill, as they severally fall due. . . . The mortgage must have been given to secure the interest as well as the principal, and the law will not withhold a remedy until a period elapses for the maturity of the whole debt,"—citing Brinckerhoff v. Thallhimer, 2 Johns. Ch. 486; 2 Hilliard, Mortg. 108. The creditor, by the terms of the contract, is entitled to the aid of the court, and to a decree for the sum due him. To refuse a foreclosure of a mortgage for his debt, as it matures, would be to deprive him of his rights without his fault. Bressler v. Martin, 133 Ill. 278.

The decree in this case found there was due to the complainants the sum of $426 47, and directed that any sale of the premises be made subject to the continuing lien of the trust deed thereon for the security of said principal note, and any and all other coupons and other disbursements made under the provisions of said trust deed, and in addition to the amounts due the complainants as aforesaid. Such decree is clearly recognized by the courts in cases like the present. Vansant v. Allmon, 23 Ill. 30–34; Weiner v. Heintz, 17 Ill. 259; Mines v. Moore, 41 Ill. 273; Sargent v. Howe, 21 Ill. 148; Kimmell v. Willard, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 217. Interest coupons are in effect promissory notes. Harper v. Ely, 70 Ill. 581; Morgenstern v. Klees, 30 Ill. 422.

It is said that the holders of the notes which had not matured were necessary parties to the bill. The rule is well established that all persons having an interest in the subject-matter which may be affected by the decree of foreclosure of the mortgage should be made parties defendant, if not joined as complainants. Bonham v. Galloway, 13 Ill 68. In this case the holders of the principal note of $3,500, and the seven coupon notes, neither of which was due at the time, were not made parties to the bill. The complainants sought to foreclose as to the first three coupon notes. They sought no relief at all that might injuriously affect the holders of the notes not due. On the contrary, the course adopted by complainants was beneficial, as to the holders of the notes not matured. The effect of the foreclosure was to withdraw from the lien of the mortgage the notes of the complainants, and to make the mortgage a security only for the remaining eight outstanding notes. The complainants had a clear right to take a decree to sell the mortgaged premises, subject to the balance due or to become due on the mortgage, and were not bound to exercise the option to declare the whole debt due.

The rights of Emily Elliott under her cross bill remain to be considered. By failing to record her agreement with Allen for the purchase of the lot until after he had procured a loan on the same for $1,500, she, in the absence of all notice of her rights, would take the title of the lots subject to the Boyer deed of trust; but at the time Mrs. Boyer loaned Allen $1,500, taking as security a mortgage on the property, and for some time before, Mrs. Elliott was in the actual occupancy and possession of the third flat of the building, and such possession was notice of her rights in relation to the entire building, and the ground on which it stood. The possession of a party need not be of every part thereof, in fact, in order to constitute notice of his rights, both legal and equitable. Possession of a part of a tract of land or a lot, under a deed for the whole, may be regarded as possession of the whole. Moreover, when the agent saw the property was occupied, it was his duty to make inquiry of those in possession, in regard to the title under which they occupied the property. Had he done this, he might have ascertained that Allen had no title. But the agent made no inquiries of any person occupying the property, but relied solely on the statement of Allen. The agent of Mrs. Boyer had notice of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry, and, as such inquiry would have disclosed the existence of Mrs. Elliott's title, he is chargeable with notice of such title.

Finding no error in the decree of the court, it must be affirmed.

Rehearing denied March 19, 1896.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

City of GRAND RAPIDS, Plff in Certiorari,
v.
Max BRAUDY

(.....Mich.....)

(July 2, 1895.)

1. The refusal of a court to proceed to trial of the prosecution on appeal from a conviction is not an acquittal.

2. The quashing of the proceedings on appeal from a conviction may be reviewed by certiorari as well as by mandamus.

3. It is common knowledge that thieves resort to pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods to dispose of stolen goods, and that unscrupulous and oftentimes criminal persons are engaged in the business.

4. A very clear abuse of the police power must be shown in order to justify the court in declaring ordinances regulating pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods, to be unreasonable and void.

5. It is not unreasonable to require a license fee of $25 per annum from junk dealers and second-hand dealers, or $50 from pawnbrokers.

6. Requiring a bond of $2,000 from a junk dealer or second-hand dealer, and one of $5,000 from a pawnbroker, conditioned for the observance of the city charter and ordinances, is not unreasonable.

7. Requiring an indorsement by twelve freeholders on an application for a license by a pawnbroker or junk dealer is not unreasonable.

8. Prohibiting purchases from boys, intoxicated persons, or habitual drunkards by licensed pawnbrokers or junk dealers, is not unreasonable.

9. Power to revoke the license arbitrarily, reserved in an ordinance regulating licenses for pawnbrokers and junk dealers, is not so unreasonable that the courts can declare it void.

CERTIORARI to the Superior Court of Grand Rapids to review a judgment quashing proceedings against defendant for violating an ordinance regulating pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

The defendant was convicted of engaging in the business of junk dealer in the city of Grand Rapids without having procured a license therefor from the common council, contrary to the provisions of "an ordinance relative to licensing and regulating pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods." The trial and conviction were had in the police court of the city. He thereupon appealed the case to the superior court of the city. The superior court, upon motion of the defendant, quashed the complaint and warrant upon the ground that the provisions of the ordinance, particularly those of §§ 7, 8, and 11, were unreasonable, and in restraint of trade. The entire ordinance is as follows:

"Sec. 1. No person shall engage in the business of pawnbroker, junk dealer, or dealer in second-hand goods and merchandise, except furniture, in the city of Grand Rapids, without a license therefor from the common council of said city.

"Sec. 2. Every person, and all persons, desiring to engage in the business of pawnbrokerage, junk dealing, in said city of or in the business of dealing in second-hand goods and merchandise, except furniture, in said city, shall make application in writing to said common council, specifying (as near as may be) the street and building in which he, she, or they, intend to carry on said busi-

NOTE.—Police power as exercised by municipalities over the business of pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand clothes.

I. Power to regulate trade.
II. Pawnbrokers.
III. Junk dealers.
IV. Dealers in second-hand clothes.

The limit of the amount of license fees is treated of in the note to State, Toi, v. French (Mont.) 30 L. R. A. 415, and State v. Wheelock (Iowa) 30 L. R. A. 429.

I. Power to regulate trade.

The authorities below must not be taken as exhaustive on the question of the power of municipal authorities to regulate trade, as they are confined to cases affecting the regulation of the business of pawnbrokers, junk, and second-hand clothes dealers, in which the general rules have been declared.

An ordinance passed under the general authority conferred by statute upon a municipal corporation must be reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state; it must not be oppressive, and must be impartial, fair, and general, and must be for the purposes of regulating, and not of restraining, trade. Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642.

Municipal authorities cannot, under the claim of exercising the police power, substantially prohibit a lawful trade, unless it is so conducted as to be injurious or dangerous to the public health. Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, 80 Ala. 579, 60 Am. Rep. 130.

And this is so for the reason that municipal authorities having power to abate nuisances cannot absolutely prohibit a lawful business, not necessarily a nuisance, but may abate it when so carried on as to constitute a nuisance. Ibid.

The legislature has undoubted power to authorize, and the authority conferred is ample to pass, ordinances for the prevention of the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases and the preservation of the public health. Ibid.

Such ordinances are considered as a part of the system of police regulations in aid of the preservation of the public health, and the courts will not interfere with, or set them aside unless the power has been manifestly transcended. Ibid.

The control which municipal corporations may exercise over business or trade is such only as belongs to the necessities and demands of local government, such as have relation to the general pursuit of the citizen, the public health, order, and morals of the community, and such a corporation cannot, outside of this consideration, enter into the arena of business competition to advance a favored class and retard others. State, Muhlenbrinck, v. Long Branch Comrs. 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518, 522.

ness, signed by at least twelve freeholders, citizens of said city, of good reputation, certifying to the good reputation, fair fame, and moral character of the applicant or applicants.

"Sec. 3. After such application shall be granted, and before a license shall be issued thereon, pawnbrokers shall execute a bond to the city of Grand Rapids in the penal sum of $5,000; and junk dealers and other persons included in this ordinance shall execute a bond to said city in the penal sum of $2,000, with one or more sufficient securities, to be approved by the mayor, conditioned that he, she, or they will in all respects comply with and faithfully observe all the requirements of the charter and ordinances of the city of Grand Rapids relative to pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second-hand goods and merchandise, except furniture. And the said pawnbrokers shall also pay into the treasury of said city the sum of $50 per annum, and the junk dealers and second-hand dealers shall pay into the treasury of said city the sum of $25 per annum as a license fee, before such license shall be issued.

"Sec. 4. Whenever said common council shall have determined to grant a license to such applicant or applicants and upon the presental to the clerk of said city of the bond herein before provided for, and the receipt of the treasurer of said city for the license fee, the said clerk shall issue to the said person or persons a license under the seal of the city, in which it shall be stated that the same is revocable at any time by the common council of said city for such time as the said common council shall have prescribed therefor; but before receiving such license such applicant or applicants shall pay to said clerk as a fee for issuing and recording the same, the sum of $1, and before the said clerk shall issue any such license he shall record the same in a book to be provided for such purpose.

"Sec. 5. No person or persons, licensed as a pawnbroker, a junk dealer, or as a dealer in second-hand goods or merchandise, except furniture, shall by virtue of one license keep more than one house, shop, or place for such business of pawnbroker, junk dealer, or dealer in second-hand goods, except furniture; provided, however, that such person or persons may remove from one place of business to another in said city by giving immediate written notice of such removal to the chief of police of said city and of the building (as near as may be) and of the street to which removal is made.

"Sec. 6. Every person or firm licensed under this ordinance shall cause his or her name or the firm name (as the case may be) with the words 'licensed pawnbroker,' 'licensed junk dealer,' or 'licensed dealer in second-hand goods and merchandise,' (as the case may be) to be printed or painted, in large legible characters, and placed over the outside or door, or entrance of his, her, or their shop, office, or place of business.

"Sec. 7. Every person, or firm of persons, licensed to carry on either of said businesses in said city, shall keep a book, in which shall be written legibly in ink, at the time of the purchase, or taking of any goods, article, or thing, an accurate account and description in the English language, of the goods, article, or other thing purchased or pledged, the amount of money paid therefor, the time of purchasing or taking the same, the name and residence of the person selling or pledging such goods, article, or thing, and a description of the person or persons (as near as may be) from whom the same were purchased or taken. And, when any watch is purchased or taken, the person or firm of persons so licensed, shall also write in such book the name of the maker thereof

All citizens in pursuit of legitimate, honest occupations stand equal before the law, and a police power intrusted to a corporation is unreasonably exercised in making invidious distinctions between citizens endowed with equal rights. Ibid.

A grant of power to control or suppress would carry with it the power to license. Shuman v. Fort Wayne, 127 Ind. 109, 11 L. R. A. 378.

In Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, it was held that the general assembly had power, except as limited by section 18 of the schedule of the Constitution, to regulate occupations by license, and to compel, by imposition of a fine, payment of a reasonable fee, where a special benefit was conferred by the public upon those who follow an occupation, or where the occupation imposed special burdens on the public, or where it was injurious or dangerous to the public.

The power to license depends upon the concurrent power to prohibit. The business or occupation is declared unlawful except upon compliance with certain conditions, and therefore a license is a privilege granted to carry on some occupation, or exercise some right, which could not be exercised without the grant of such license; the pursuit of the prohibited occupation becomes a franchise in the power of the municipal authorities to grant, and the license fee is the price exacted for the right to exercise the franchise. Shuman v. Fort Wayne, supra.

The power to license must be granted in express terms, although it is merely a police power. It is one mode of regulation, but one that cannot be exercised under general police authority. Ibid.

To license one, means to confer upon him the right to do something which he would not have the right to do without such license, and the object of the license is to confer a right which does not exist. Ibid.

But the right to license must be plainly conferred or it will not be held to exist. Ibid.

All licenses are in their nature restrictive, and a municipal corporation cannot restrict a lawful business unless the power to do so is conferred by the state. Ibid.

A defendant, having full notice of the provisions of the ordinance before taking out his license, cannot afterwards be held to say that such ordinance is oppressive or tyrannical. Launder v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 291, 53 Am. Rep. 625.

And such an ordinance does not depend upon the opinions of witnesses as to the possible and probable effect of it upon the party's business for the construction of its reasonableness or legality. Ibid.

II. Pawnbrokers.

A city ordinance imposing upon pawnbrokers the duty of making out and delivering, every day before a specified time, a legible and correct copy of a certain book kept by them, containing an ac-and its number; and when jewelry, or gold or silver articles of any kind are purchased or taken, he, she, or they shall note, in said book, all letters or marks, described, engraved, or cut thereon.

"Sec. 8. That it shall be the duty of every person or firm of persons aforesaid, to make out and deliver to the chief of police of said city, every day before the hour of twelve o'clock noon, a legible and correct copy from the book required in § 7 hereof, giving an accurate account and description of each and all of the articles and things purchased or taken during the preceding day, the price paid therefor, the precise time of purchase or taking, the name and residence of the person or persons, from whom such purchases were made, and a description of the person or persons (as near as may be) from whom purchased or taken.

"Sec. 9. The book provided for in § 7 of this ordinance shall at all reasonable times be open to the inspection of the mayor of said city, or of the chief of police, or any member of the police force, thereunto authorized by the said chief of police.

"Sec. 10. It shall be the duty of every person or firm of persons, licensed as aforesaid, upon him, her, or them (as the case may be) receiving information or learning that any goods, article, or thing left with him, her, or his or her firm, has been lost or stolen, to notify in writing the chief of police of the fact, giving the name of the person from whom he, she, or they received the same, the time when it was received, and of any other facts connected therewith, that may tend to the discovery or conviction of the thief or thieves.

"Sec. 11. No person, or firm of persons, licensed as aforesaid, shall purchase or take any goods, articles, or thing offered him, her, or them, from any person under the age of sixteen years, or from any person who is at the time intoxicated, or from any person who is an habitual drunkard; nor knowingly take or purchase from any servant or apprentice any goods, article, or thing, without first ascertaining that such article or thing is the property of the person or persons offering to sell or pledge the same.

"Sec. 12. Any person or persons who shall violate any of the provisons or requirements of this ordinance, on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5, nor more than $50 and costs of prosecution; or, by imprisonment at hard labor in the common jail of the county of Kent, or in any penitentiary, jail, workhouse, house of correction, or almshouse of said city, in the discretion of the court or magistrate before whom the conviction may be had, for a period of not less than five days nor more than ninety days. And in case such court or magistrate shall only impose a fine and costs, the offender may be sentenced to be imprisoned at hard labor in the common jail of the county of Kent, or in any penitentiary, jail, workhouse, house of correction, or almshouse of said city, until the payment of such fine and costs, for a period of not less than five days nor more than ninety days."

Messrs. Henry J. Felker and Harvey Joslin, for plaintiff in certiorari:

In determining a question as to the reasonableness of an ordinance, the court will have to regard all the circumstances of the particular city or corporation, the objects sought to be attained, and the necessity which exists for the ordinance.

What the legislature distinctly says may be done cannot be set aside by the courts because they may deem it unreasonable or against sound policy.

count of the personal property and valuables taken by them in pawn during the preceding day, together with other particulars respecting such persons and goods, is not unjust, unreasonable, tyrannical, or oppressive, but is a reasonable means of keeping the pawnbroker's business free from great abuse by reason of thieves disposing of stolen goods in their shops, such an ordinance being made in the interest of the public and intended for the detection and prevention of crime. Launder v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 291, 53 Am. Rep. 625.

In Launder v. Chicago, supra, the question was whether the legislature had conferred the power on the city council to pass an ordinance relating to pawnbrokers, the legislature having given the city council in cities, and the president and trustees in villages, power "to license, tax, regulate, suppress, and prohibit . . . pawnbrokers, . . . and to revoke such licenses at pleasure" (Rev. Stat. chap. 24, § 62, subs. 41), and the court held that such grant of power was purely a matter of discretion with the city authorities, whether they granted such licenses or wholly prohibited and suppressed such business within the city, and that in such a case, if the city granted a license, it might impose such conditions and burdens as it might see fit, the latitude of power growing out of the fact that it was discretionary to prohibit the business, or license it on such terms as the city might choose.

And in Heitzelman v. State (Tex.) 26 S. W. 729, upon a prosecution under the pawnbroker act, the defendant was convicted of receiving in pledge an article of property and selling the same without complying with the laws regulating pawnbrokers, for which he was fined $100 under article 386 of the Penal Code. It was held, upon appeal, that evidence of the fact that he was carrying on a pawnbroking business, and that he failed to file a copy of the advertisement, or report of the sale in question, as required by the law, was properly admitted to rebut any suggestion of mistake or inattention, and to show beyond controversy that the sale was made in violation of law.

So, in Van Baalen v. People, 40 Mich. 258, the defendant was fined for carrying on the business of a pawnbroker without a license contrary to the city ordinance, and an exception was taken, by way of certiorari, upon the ground that the ordinance, which imposed a fine of $200, was unreasonable in consequence of the magnitude of the charge, and was therefore invalid: but the court refused to interfere, holding that where the power to license was not evidently abused and made a pretext for doing what was a violation of a constitutional right, the courts would not interfere with municipal discretion.

In Launder v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 291, 53 Am. Rep. 625, it was shown that the pawnbroker would not, without the license conferred upon him by the city authorities, have had a right to carry on the busidiscretion, but by its own, and we shall not be hasty in convicting them of being unreasonable in the exercise of it.

People v. Armstrong, supra; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 262.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is first insisted that this is a criminal case, that the action of the court amounted to an acquittal, and that the city is therefore remediless. This position cannot be maintained. There was no trial upon the merits. The court simply refused to proceed to trial, and quashed the proceedings, because it held the ordinance invalid. This court has repeatedly issued the writ of mandamus to compel circuit and recorder's courts to proceed with the trial of criminal cases under similar circumstances. People, Robison, v. Swift, 59 Mich. 529; Sadler v. Sheahan, 92 Mich. 630. See also Ware v. Loveridge, 75 Mich. 488. While the writ of mandamus may be the more appropriate remedy, the same result is reached by the writ of certiorari, which has been held to be the proper remedy to review convictions for violation of city ordinances. Swift v. Judges of Circuit Ct. 64 Mich. 487; People v. White, 53 Mich. 537.

2. It is next insisted that the ordinance is so unreasonable that it should be declared void. The charter expressly confers upon the common council the power to license and regulate pawnbrokers, junk dealers, and dealers in second hand goods. Courts cannot interfere with legislative discretion, and are slow to declare ordinances invalid because unreaness in question, and therefore he took the privilege which was granted him by the city authorities subject to the restrictions and burdens imposed by the ordinance in question.

In Kuhn v. Chicago, 30 Ill. App. 203, it was contended that § 1711 of the ordinance of the city of Chicago, which provided: "No pawnbroker or loan-broker, or keeper of a loan office, shall, under any pretense whatever, purchase or buy second-hand furniture, metals, or clothes, or any other article or thing whatever to him or her offered as a pawn or pledge."—was unreasonable, because it imposed a penalty on pawnbrokers for doing that which was lawful for other persons to do; but the court held that the statute (Ill. Rev. Stat. art. 5, chap. 24, § 1) authorized cities, not only to regulate pawnbrokers, but to suppress and prohibit them, and therefore the imposition of a fine for a breach of such regulation applied equally to all pawnbrokers, and was therefore not unreasonable.

In Queen v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Ohlson's Case, Garland's Case [1891] 1 Q. B. 485, the question arose under the English pawnbroker's act of 1872, § 39, which provided that a pawnbroker's license was only to be granted to an applicant upon the production of a magistrate's certificate, "save that it shall not be necessary for any person being at the commencement of this act a licensed pawnbroker, or for his executors, administrators, assigns, or successors, to obtain such certificate." It was held that the exemption in favor of a pawnbroker licensed at the commencement of the act was not confined to the business which was then actually carried on by such pawnbroker, but was a general exemption in favor of all persons who were then licensed pawnbrokers, and that therefore after the commencement of the act such a licensed pawnbroker, his executors, administrators, assigns, or successors could open a new business upon payment of the license duty without the production of a magistrate's certificate.

But in Phillips v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 773, it was held that unless there was a municipal ordinance authorizing it, the recorder could not impose a fine for engaging in the business of a pawnbroker without a license, but that a valid ordinance on the subject might be enforced in that way, under § 2137 of the Code of that state.

So, in Shuman v. Fort Wayne, 127 Ind. 109, 11 L. R. A. 378, it was held that an ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to take out licenses was not authorized by a statute empowering city councils to make by-laws and ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the state, and necessary to carry out the objects of the corporation.

And in Schaul v. Charlotte (N. C.) 24 S. E. 526, it was held that the businesses of broker and pawnbroker constituted separate and distinct classes, and that it was competent for the city authorities under the private laws, to impose an entirely dif-

sonable, when the power to legislate upon the subject has been conferred upon the common council. The council's discretion, and not the court's, must control. In such matters the city authorities are usually better judges than the courts. Fisher v. Harrisburg, 2 Grant, Cas. 291; Com. v. Robertson, 5 Cush. 438; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 547; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 328. "Regard must be had to all the circumstances of the particular city or corporation, the objects sought to be attained, and the necessity which exists for the ordinance." Id. § 327. It is common knowledge that thieves resort to these places to dispose of their stolen goods, and that unscrupulous, and oftentimes criminal, persons are engaged in the business. The business, therefore, comes expressly within the control of the police power of the state, and is properly subject to reasonable rules and regulations. A very clear abuse of this power must be shown in order to justify the court in declaring the regulations to be unreasonable and void. While this business is legitimate in the absence of any statute law controlling it, no inalienable right exists to carry it on without complying with those provisions and restrictions which the legislative power of the state has seen fit to require. This brings us to the provisions complained of. Neither the license fee of $25 or $50 nor the bond is unreasonable. This was decided in Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325. The license fee in that case was $100 for keeping a saloon or restaurant, and the bond $2,000. The defense was that, if it assumed to license the sale of intoxicating liquors, the ordinance was void under the Constitution which prohibited its sale; and if it involved the license of a restaurant it was void, as unreasonable, and in restraint of trade. The ordinance did not provide for or authorize the sale of intoxicating liquors. It was insisted that a saloon was necessarily a place for the sale of such liquors. The court held otherwise, and in illustrating the argument said: "A pawnbroker might as well attempt to do business without a license, by confining his dealings to stolen goods, or an auctioneer, by making no legitimate sales, and holding none but Peter Funk auctions." There is nothing unreasonable in requiring such persons to keep a record of their purchases and sales, and to furnish a statement thereof to the police department. This provision is no more unreasonable, and certainly is as essential for the protection of society, as the law regulating druggists, which requires them to record in a book the names of all persons applying for intoxicating liquors, the date of sale, the amount and kind of liquor sold, and the purpose for which the same was to be applied. Pub. Acts 1887, act No. 313, § 3. The statutes of several states provide that, in order to obtain a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the application must be indorsed by a certain number of freeholders, certifying to the good character and reputation of the applicant. This is upon the theory that the state has the right to require that such business shall be carried on by reputable men, and not by the disreputable, vicious, and criminal classes. This provision has been universally sustained by the courts. The same principle applies to junk dealers and pawnbrokers, and we find nothing unreason-ferent license tax upon pawnbrokers and brokers, but that the private act of 1866, which related to the license to be paid by brokers, did not extend to pawnbrokers,—the court citing and approving of the principal case of ROSENBAUM v. NEWBERN (N. C.) post, 123.

In Fulton v. District of Columbia, 2 D. C. App. 431, it was held that § 3 of the act of Congress of January 26, 1887 (24 Stat. at L. p. 368), authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations for the government of the district, which prohibited pawnbrokers from permitting the redemption or removal of the article pawned from the place of business of such pawnbroker, junk dealer, or person engaged in the second-hand clothing business, for the space of twenty-four hours thereafter, was an unreasonable regulation, in so far as it prohibited the redemption and removal of all pawned property by the owner thereof, and was not within the powers given to such commissioners by the said statute nor by the general resolution of February, 1892; and a conviction under it was therefore quashed and the accused discharged.

III. Junk dealers.

A junk shop has been defined as a place where odds and ends are purchased or sold. Charleston v. Goldsmith, 12 Rich. L. 470.

Where a city ordinance prohibited the purchase or sale of old metal, old ropes, rags, and other odds and ends in a shop kept within the city, without a license, it was held that the defendant, whose business consisted in the buying and keeping in his store, and shipping from thence, for sale, the articles in question, was properly convicted, under the city ordinance, of keeping a junk shop without a license. Ibid.

In Com. v. Leonard, 140 Mass. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 485, the defendant was indicted as a junk dealer for receiving stolen goods, and not complying with the provisions of the Massachusetts statutes and the ordinance of the city of Cambridge, which required him to keep a book for the purpose of entering a record of the articles purchased by him, and it was held that if the defendant intentionally neglected to keep such book for the purpose of tracing all articles purchased by him as a junk dealer, such a fact was competent to be considered by the jury.

The provisions of §§ 1, 2, 22, 26, and 35, of the Ohio act of April 16, 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, 129), and § 29, as amended by the act of March 25, 1884 (81 Ohio Laws, 78), which required that in cities of the first grade of the first class a proprietor, or lessee, of a theater, and, inter alia, every dealer in second-hand articles and keepers of junk shops, should pay a license as therein provided, that no person should engage in any such business until a license therefor should have been obtained, and that any person who should violate any of the provisions of the act should be punished by fine,—have been held not to be in conflict with the Constitution. Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63.

In Pitts v. Vicksburg, 72 Miss. 181, the question raised was whether junk stores were embraced in the term "stores" in § 3390 of the Mississippi Code of 1892, by which a privilege tax was levied on each store where the stock never exceeded in value $2,000. The court held that such stores were within the provisions of the Code, as, until the legislature undertook the work of classification of stores generally, the generic term used in the Code would able in the requirement that the application to enter upon the business shall be indorsed by twelve freeholders.

We cannot hold unreasonable that provision prohibiting the licensee from purchasing from boys, intoxicated persons, or habitual drunkards. The reason for this provision is apparent, for it is well known that there are many young thieves in the large cities, who steal property, and resort to these places, ready to sell them for mere nominal sums. It is also well known that habitual drunkards will use the same means to obtain money to satisfy their appetites for intoxicating liquors.

The only other provision we need to notice is that giving the power to revoke the license arbitrarily. It seems to be conceded by counsel for the city that the common council does not possess the right to revoke the license without cause shown. He says: "It must be presumed that this right would be exercised only in cases of violation of the conditions of the ordinance, and after an investigation of such a charge; otherwise an action of the common council in assuming to so revoke arbitrarily could be restrained from doing injustice to the licensee." No express power to revoke is conferred upon the council. In the investigation we have been able to make we find but few authorities bearing upon the subject, and counsel in their briefs have cited none. We find two authorities sustaining this power. Com. v. Kinsley, 133 Mass. 579; Martin v. State, 23 Neb. 371. But in both these cases the express power to revoke was conferred upon the city by its charter. If no reservation of the right to revoke was reserved in the license, there would be little difficulty in reaching a conclusion. Has the common council the right to insist, as a condition precedent to the issue of the license, that the applicant shall agree that his license may be revoked at the will of the council? is the question presented. The necessity of a rigid control over this business in our large cities is clear. Convictions are difficult though the public authorities may be well convinced that stolen goods are bought and sold at these places. The business is not necessary to the welfare of society or the public. The common council, with the knowledge of all the facts before them to a greater extent than courts can possibly have, have determined that it is well, in their judgment, to require these conditions. While the exercise of any arbitrary power may seem harsh, still we are of the opinion that this requirement is not so unreasonable as to require the courts to declare it void. Counsel for defendant cite and rely upon Chaddock v. Day, 75 Mich. 527, 4 L. R. A. 809; Hughes v. Recorder's Court, 75 Mich. 574; Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396; People v. Armstrong, 73 Mich. 288, 2 L. R. A. 721. An examination of these cases will show that in neither their facts nor principles are they like the case at bar. It is unnecessary for us to note the distinctions.

We hold the ordinance valid, and the order of the court below is reversed, and the court directed to proceed with the trial of the cause.

The other Justices concur.

embrace any species of store not otherwise particularly named and taxed, there being no reference to any particular class or character of goods named, the word being broad enough to cover any store, even one in which the dealer dealt in old iron and other metals, old glass, old rope, and old paper stock.

Where a junk dealer took exception to a city ordinance imposing a tax or license of $250 upon every member of a company or firm, and every person not connected with a company or firm, keeping a junk store, upon the ground that the same was not constitutional, since it imposed different sums or licenses on the general dealer in merchandise and the dealer in specified articles, the court held that the constitutional requirement that taxation should be equal and uniform throughout the state (art. 118) did not inhibit the legislature from, nor deprive it of, the power of dividing the objects of taxation into classes, but that it did command the law-making department of the government to impose the same burden upon all who were in the same class; and further, that the legislature of the state having, by act of 1870 (Extra Sess. pp. 35-37), empowered the city council to levy taxes and impose a license tax upon all persons pursuing any trade, profession, or calling,—the tax imposed upon the defendant as a junk dealer was legal. New Orleans v. Kaufman, 29 La. Ann. 283, 29 Am. Rep. 328.

But in Pitts v. Vicksburg, supra, where it was sought to show that the municipal tax levied by the city ordinance upon junk stores was done in the exercise of the police power of the city, but the ordinance itself plainly declared that the taxes therein enumerated were levied in order to provide a revenue for the city, the court held that the authority to levy taxes by a city was not embraced in its police power, the power to raise revenue being one thing, and the power of police regulation another, and that therefore the city had no power to levy the tax.

IV. Dealers in second-hand clothes.

Second-hand or cast-off garments, blankets, bedding, and bed-clothes become dangerous by reason of the nature of their previous use, condition, or exposure. Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, 80 Ala. 579, 60 Am. Rep. 130.

Dealers in second-hand articles, and keepers of junk shops, may properly be classed with pawnbrokers and keepers of loan offices who are required to obtain licenses because of imposing special burdens by reason of their requiring the supervising powers of the police. Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63.

Ordinances having for their object the protection of the health of the inhabitants are regarded as police regulations subject to which the individual holds his right of liberty or property, and presumptions will be indulged in, in favor of their necessity, propriety, and validity, and where not unreasonable, or partial, nor oppressive, nor inconsistent with the legislative policy of the state, they will be sustained. Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, supra.

In State v. Segel, 60 Minn. 507, it was held that an ordinance passed pursuant to the charter of the city of Minneapolis, which authorized the city council to make and enforce ordinances to license and regulate "dealers in second-hand goods," embraced dealers in second-hand furniture.

Second-hand or cast-off garments, blankets, bedding, and bed-clothes are not per se introductive of infectious or contagious disease, and a lawful busi-

STATE of North Carolina
v.
Ernest TAFT, Appt.

(.....N. C.....)

An ordinance making it unlawful to import into a town any second-hand clothing, garment, cloth, or bed furniture for the purpose of selling or offering it for sale, is void as an attempt absolutely to prohibit a lawful business not in itself necessarily a nuisance, but which may be conducted without danger to the community when properly regulated.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Franklin County convicting him of a violation of a town ordinance against selling second-hand clothing. Reversed.

Defendant had, prior to the enactment of the ordinance, procured a quantity of second-hand clothing which he intended to sell in Louisburg, and at the time the ordinance was passed it was at the railroad station unpacked. Subsequently he placed it in his store and sold some of it, for which act he was subjected to this prosecution. The expert evidence in support of the necessity of the ordinance was to the effect that contagious diseases are caused by germs which might be carried in woolen fabrics and could not be absolutely destroyed by anything but heat of 250 degrees F. which degree of heat would injure the fabric.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ordinance for a violation of which the defendant was convicted is as follows: "No. 47. That it shall be unlawful for any person, merchant, or dealer to import into the town of Louisburg, for the purpose of selling or offering for sale, any second hand clothing, garment, cloth, or bed furniture; and any person, merchant, or dealer who shall import any such article into said town with the purpose aforesaid, or shall sell or offer the same for sale, shall for every such act be subject to a fine of $25." It is enacted in chapter 142 of the private acts of 1887 that the general laws in regard to cities and towns, in the Code, shall apply to the town of Louisburg; and it is provided in that chapter of the Code that the commissioners of towns "may pass laws for abating or preventing nuisances of any kind, and for preserving the health of the citizens," and that "they may enforce their by laws and regulations by imposing penalties on such as violate them." The preamble sets forth that ness of selling or dealing in them may be carried on without danger to the public health. Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, supra.

Where an ordinance reaches beyond the scope of necessary protection and prevention, into the domain of restraint of lawful trade, by permanently prohibiting the importation, selling, or otherwise dealing in second-hand or cast-off garments, blankets, bedding, and bed clothes, though they may not have been used by persons or in districts infected with such diseases, it will not be upheld. Ibid.

In Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, supra, the town charter conferred authority "to pass and enforce all ordinances deemed necessary or proper to prevent the introduction of infectious diseases, and to preserve the health of the inhabitants of the same," and under such power the corporate authorities passed an ordinance declaring "that it shall be unlawful for any person to import, sell, or otherwise deal in cast-off garments, blankets, bedding, or bed-clothes in said town . . . provided, that this ordinance shall not apply to the sale of said articles not imported, and that have not been used by persons having infectious diseases." The court held that the municipal authorities had not power under the charter to pass the ordinance in question.

Although the municipal government may pass sanitary ordinances for the preservation of health within its limits, may prevent articles of merchandise or other things, which have been used by persons or in places infected with contagious diseases, from being brought into the town, may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection regulations, and provide for disinfecting or destroying the germs of disease as far as practicable, and, it may be, for obtaining satisfactory assurance that such articles have not been exposed to an infectious or the object of the ordinance was the protection of the health of the community. Beyond question, the general assembly has power to authorize the commissioners of towns to pass by-laws intended to prevent the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases, and to preserve the public health, and the powers conferred under the statutes above referred to are admitted to be sufficient for those purposes. Such ordinances are regarded as police regulations, are of the utmost consequence to the general welfare, and if they be reasonable, impartial, and not against the general policy of the state, must be submitted to by individuals, for the good of the public. In truth, the public health, and the peace and good order of the community, ought to be the chief concern of the authorities of cities and towns; and the courts are quick to encourage watchfulness in this respect on their part, will always presume that they have acted from a sense of propriety and necessity, and will never interfere with or set aside their ordinances unless it appears clearly that they are unreasonable, or beyond the scope of their authority. It is not to be doubted, however, that the courts have the right to inquire into any alleged abuse of their powers, and to restrain them when they transcend the limits of their authority.

The question presented in this case for our consideration is whether the commissioners can, under the powers given them by law, in their discretion, absolutely prohibit a lawful business, not in itself necessarily a nuisance, but which may be conducted without danger to the community, when properly regulated. The sale of second hand clothing is not a nuisance per se, but is, on the other hand, a lawful business, and, under proper regulations, may be so conducted as to be without danger to the health of the community, and at the same time to be of great benefit to a large portion of the people. There is nothing dangerous to health in articles of second-hand clothing, of themselves. They can only become noxious by reason of prior use,—of having been worn or possessed by persons themselves infected, or living in infected communities. The town authorities would have the right to compel fumigation and disinfection of second hand clothing. They might require proper assurances, before such articles were imported or offered for sale, that they have not been bought in or brought from markets or places where epidemics of contagious or infectious diseases were or had been recently prevailing, or they might prohibit the further sale of such stocks from which articles had been sold and had communicated disease. In the case of Greensboro v. Ehrenreich, 80 Ala. 579, 60 Am. Rep. 130, the ordinance was not as prohibitory as the one before us, and the court there, in passing upon its validity, said: "Municipal authorities, having power to abate nuisances, cannot absolutely prohibit a lawful business not necessarily a nuisance, but may abate it when so carried on as to constitute a nuisance. They cannot under the claim of exercising the police power, substantially prohibit a lawful trade, unless it is so conducted as to be injurious or dangerous to the public health. If they can declare it unlawful to import, sell, or otherwise deal in second-hand or cast off garments, blankets, bedding, and bedclothes, without regard to the circumstances or necessity, they may, under the same power, declare it unlawful to import or sell meat because at some times and in some places, it is infected with trichina." The same principle is also decided in Weil v. Ricord, 24 N. J. Eq. 169. We are of the opinion that the commissioners transcended their powers in the passing of this ordinance; that it is unreasonable, in that it is prohibitory of a business lawful in itself, and that it is void.

In Eastman v. Chicago, 79 Ill. 178, it was held that a book seller who dealt in such stock as was usually kept in a retail book store, and bought and sold in connection with his other business second-hand books, was not a dealer in second-hand goods within the provisions of § 1, chap. 24, of an ordinance of the city of Chicago which declared: "Any person who keeps a store, office, or place of business for the purchase or sale of second hand clothing, or garments of any kind, or second-hand goods, wares, or merchandise, is hereby declared to be a dealer in second-hand goods."

In Duluth v. Bloom, 55 Minn. 97, 21 L. R. A. 689, the defendant was convicted, under an ordinance of the city of Duluth, of "carrying on and conducting the business of dealer in second-hand goods without first having obtained a license so to do." The facts showed that he dealt in new and second-hand furniture exclusively, and the question was whether such business came within the provisions of the city ordinance which gave the city authority power to license and regulate, inter alia, pawnbrokers, dealers in second-hand goods, junk dealers, etc., and provided that the council should have power to regulate and define who should be considered as such dealers. The first section provided that no person should carry on or conduct the business or calling of a pawnbroker or dealer in second-hand goods without first obtaining a license, but did not attempt to define who should be considered as pawnbrokers or dealers in second-hand goods; and the last clause of the 7th section provided that all the provisions of that ordinance should apply to any person keeping a second-hand store or junk shop. The court held that the defendant's store was not a junk shop within the meaning of the ordinance which applied only to pawnbroker's shops and to second-hand stores, or shops of the class commonly known as junk shops.

clothing, and a tax of $1 per month on the occupation of selling general merchandise, do not violate a constitutional requirement of uniformity, since this requires uniformity only between those belonging to the same class.

4. A penal ordinance requiring second-hand clothing to be disinfected by fumigation, and requiring payment of a fixed price therefor according to the nature of the garment, must be deemed, in the absence of direct and unquestionable proof to the contrary, to be for the protection of the public health.

(March 10, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the collection of certain taxes imposed for the privilege of doing business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Clarke, M. De W. Stevenson, and W. D. McIver for appellant.

Mr. W. W. Clark for appellee.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Where a municipality is clothed with the power to impose a tax upon persons engaged in mercantile business, the authority is subject to the fundamental restriction that it shall not be so exercised as to discriminate between persons of the same class. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663. "It is unquestionably, however, in the discretion of the taxing power to graduate the tax according to the extent of the business so taxed, or to impose a single tax upon the occupation without regard to its extent." State v. Powell, 100 N. C. 527. But the law of uniformity does not prohibit the classification by the municipality of dealers in a particular kind of merchandise separately from those whose business it is to sell other articles falling within the same generic term. The term "merchant" embraces all who buy and sell any species of movable goods for gain or profit. But courts everywhere lend their sanction to legislative acts putting dealers in dry goods and dealers in spirituous liquors, drugs, or fresh meats into different classes, and imposing a license tax upon the one, and a tax in proportion to capital employed or sales made on the others, or a tax or license fee of the same kind, but differing in amount, upon each of the subclasses created. In State v. Worth, 116 N. C. 1007, it was held that the business of manufacturing ice was comprehended under the general term "trade," and that, where a municipality was acting under the grant of authority to impose a privilege tax upon trades and professions "a levy of $66 per annum for storage, manufacture, or sale of ice at wholesale, with the privilege of retailing," was reasonable and constitutional, because it provided for no discrimination between persons engaged in storing, manufacturing or selling at wholesale or retail the particular kind of merchandise upon which the burden was imposed, but fixed the levy upon a class of traders distinctly defined in the ordinance. It was expressly held there that dealers in or manufacturers of different articles of merchandise might, in the discretion of the municipal authorities, be subjected, in separate classes, to license taxes varying in amount as to each of the classes. Of course, it follows that the overlooking of manufactures of shoes would not render invalid a tax upon another company whose product was ice, tobacco, or cotton goods. It is therefore settled that the only uniformity contemplated in the constitutional restriction (Const. art. 5, § 3) is that between those belonging to the same class (State Railroad Tax Cases, supra), and it would seem almost needless to cite authorities, other than State v. Worth, supra, in support of the proposition that the legislature had the authority to delegate to the defendant the power to make such levies. Const. art. 5, § 4.

The levy complained of was not imposed upon property, but upon the business of selling second-hand clothing. Had the tax been imposed upon the clothing sold as a property tax, it must have been levied in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution, both as to uniformity and value. But it was within the sound discretion of the municipal legislators, if they were empowered to tax the occupation or business at all, to determine what amount should be paid by every person belonging to a well defined class pointed out in an ordinance. State v. Powell, supra. It is clear that the city had authority to "levy and collect a license tax for the privilege of carrying on any trade, profession, or business" within the limits of the city, not only under the charter, but under the general law. State v. Worth, supra; Code, § 3800. Whatever power the legislature possesses under the Constitution has been delegated to the municipality, and the question for consideration here is, not whether the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, will hold the ordinance to be just, reasonable, or wise, but whether, resolving all doubts as to the exercise of legislative authority by its agent as would be done in favor of a statute enacted by the legislature itself, it clearly appears that the ordinance is unconstitutional. The authority "to levy and collect a license tax for the privilege of carrying on any trade, profession, or business," subject to a prescribed limit as to amount, necessarily carried with it, by implication, the power to classify the various kinds of business, just as the legislature might have done. If, therefore, it be conceded that the court can revise the classification adopted by the city, when it does not appear upon its face that there was a purpose to discriminate in restraint of trade, there is no reason why any one of the taxes imposed in Schedules B and C of the revenue act (Laws 1895, chap. 116) should not be brought before the courts for review, on the ground that it is unreasonable to levy it on that particular class of subjects, though it be admitted that it sometimes constitutes a distinct kind of business, because some dealer may have chosen to make his business more general in its character. In the absence of any evidence of a purpose to break down the sale of this species of goods, courts are powerless. It is the peculiar province of the legislature to reform the laws so as to make the benefits extend to and the burdens bear equally upon all classes of people.

The plaintiff complains that, in addition to the tax of $4 per month levied upon her as a dealer in second-hand clothing, she is liable, under another ordinance, to a license tax of $1 per month for the privilege of selling other general merchandise. If the city of Wilmington would have been authorized to levy the tax imposed in Worth's Case upon a general merchant, notwithstanding the fact that he added to his general business that of wholesale dealer in ice, it is clear that the plaintiff could not evade a tax on one distinct business by combining with it another. Because clothing may be comprehended under general merchandise, the courts cannot question the honesty or the soundness of the discretion of the city authorities in subdividing a larger class of dealers into two or more, distinguished by the lines of goods sold by each. Indeed, it is the duty of the courts to impute to all who exercise legislative authority proper motives, and, as between two constructions of their legislation, to adopt, if possible, that which brings it within the purview of their powers. State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714. It does not seem to be contended that the municipality is attempting to exact from the plaintiff license taxes greater in the aggregate yearly amount than the limit fixed by the charter, though another ordinance provides that a tax of $1 per month shall be imposed on general merchants, and $4 on any dealer whose business, in part or in whole, is selling second-hand clothing, since the limit applies only to the amount of any single license tax, not to the aggregate amount of two when they are lawfully imposed. The rule laid down in State v. Powell precludes us from reviewing the exercise of the discretion in classifying those subjected to such burdens, or in determining what amount shall be imposed upon each. But the Constitution of North Carolina authorizes the legislature, not only to impose a license tax upon the occupation of selling, but a property tax upon the goods sold, provided the statute, upon its face, allows no discrimination; and, subject to the same restrictions, the legislature may delegate this power to municipalities. State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 731.

The plaintiff by way of recital sets forth that the defendant has passed, and has already enforced, another ordinance, which imposes a fine of $50 for selling or offering for sale second-hand clothing without having it disinfected by fumigation, and by paying a price fixed according to the nature of the garment, as set forth in the ordinance. A part of the relief asked is, not only that the city authorities be restrained from collecting more than $1 per month as a license tax, but that they be restrained from exacting, in future, fees so large as plaintiff has paid for disinfecting the clothing now on hand. This ordinance was passed, clearly, in the exercise of police power claimed to have been delegated by the state, and is an assumption of authority quite distinct from the power to levy license or taxes. Though relating to the same subject-matter, the validity of the two acts is in no way dependent upon the same grants of power (State v. Stevenson, supra), and the passage of the one has no bearing upon the right to enact the other. The previous passing of the ordinance requiring disinfection does not tend to show that the ordinance, the enactment of which was declared in Powell's Case to be an unreviewable exercise of sound discretion, was unauthorized. The license tax was lawfully imposed, if the municipality was clothed with the power to classify, and did not discriminate in the exercise of its delegated authority. The ordinance requiring disinfection was enacted ostensibly—and, until direct and unquestionable proof to the contrary is offered, must be deemed in reality to have been passed—for the protection of the public health. "The legislature is empowered under the organic law to restrict an individual by direct enactment in the exercise of such dominion and control over his own house or premises, as may result in injury to others, provided the prohibitory or restraining statute does not upon its face discriminate in favor of one person or class of persons over others. And, though the law-making power can unquestionably create a municipal corporation and delegate legislative authority to it, it cannot clothe the creature with power to do what the Constitution prohibits the creator from doing." State v. Tenant, 28 Am. St. Rep. 716, and note; Id. 110 N. C. 609, 15 L. R. A. 423; State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 721; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205. When the municipality, however, attempts to abuse a power expressly and rightfully granted to it, by restricting the dominion of the owner over his property, not according to a rule general and uniform in its application to a class of persons or to a classification of property, the ordinance imposing such restraint is unconstitutional and void. State v. Tenant, supra, and authorities there cited. But the charter (Priv. Laws 1879, chap. 42, § 18) empowers the municipal authorities "by all needful ordinances to secure order, health, quiet, and safety" within the limits of the city. It was not unreasonable to require one who was engaged in the sale of second hand clothing to turn it over to the city authorities to be disinfected. It is a matter of universal knowledge that such clothing is the means, often, of communicating contagious and dangerous diseases; and it was but a proper and lawful use of the authority to protect the health of the community, under local government of the city, to use the means adopted to prevent the introduction of disease. The right to sell or to buy such articles is not an absolute one, but may be subjected to such restriction, by the lawmaking power intrusted with the authority, as may be necessary to make its exercise consistent with the safety and security of others.

The general property tax, being imposed under a distinct grant of authority, must be considered separate and apart from the exercise of any other power, and, so considered, just such an ordinance as that under consideration has been declared to be in conformity with the constitutional requirements and consistent with the ad valorem levy on property. Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119. The plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages from the municipality for passing an ordinance in the exercise of its legislative authority as a branch of the government (Moffitt v. Asheville, 103 N. C. 237; Id. 14 Am. St. Rep. 810 and note) and cannot maintain her status in court upon any such claim as a cause of action.

The only other remedy which the plaintiff demands, and upon which she bases her claim of right to maintain the action, is an injunction against the collection of the license tax of $4 per month, and against collecting the amount now paid for disinfecting. Under the provision contained in section 76, chap. 119 of the Laws of 1895, the injunction will not lie to restrain the municipality, unless it appear that the levy or assessment was illegal. If, as has been shown, it was competent to classify dealers in second-hand clothing separately from vendors of other articles of general merchandise, it would follow that it was no more illegal for the city to exact $1 per month on one class and $4 per month on another, as license tax for distinct kinds of business, than it would have been to exact $66 per annum and an additional merchant license fee of $1 per month in Worth's Case, had the wholesale ice dealer's establishment constituted a part of a general merchant's store, or to levy, in addition to a particular license tax, a uniform ad valorem tax on property. State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 730. The ordinance imposing a fine for failure to have the clothing disinfected, and fixing the cost of fumigating, was also within the purview of the powers of the city, and this court has no authority to review the schedule of charges fixed by it. If the municipality has abused the powers granted, it is a grievance for which complaint may be made to the legislature, whose province it is to restrict or withdraw entirely its legislative authority; but it is obvious that the extraordinary power of the courts cannot be invoked to restrain the exercise of a discretionary legislative power, and it is as well settled that the action for damages at law for the alleged wrongful exercise of such powers will not lie. We think, therefore, that there is not, in any aspect of the case, a statement of a cause of action, since no amendment could be made, which would establish an apparent right to either a restraining order now or a verdict for damages on the trial of the action.

There was no error in dissolving the restraining order.

Furches, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff is a merchant in the city of Newbern, carrying a stock of about $1,500, one tenth of which, or $150, is second-hand clothing. The city has one ordinance taxing all merchants $1 per month for the privilege of merchandising within its corporate limits, and another ordinance requiring all merchants dealing in second-hand clothing to submit it to city authorities for fumigation to be done at the expense of the owner, and imposing a fine of $50 if this is not done, and a third ordinance imposing another tax on dealers in second hand clothing of $4 per month. The plaintiff claims that this legislation on the part of the city is unlawful, unconstitutional, and oppressive, and brings this action to enjoin and restrain the city from enforcing these ordinances which require her to submit the clothing for fumigation, and to pay the privilege tax of $4 per month for selling second-hand clothing. The first of these ordinances, providing for fumigation, falls under the doctrine of police regulations; and it has been held at this term, in State v. Taft (N. C.) ante, 122, that second-hand clothing is not per se a nuisance, and its sale could not be prohibited without evidence that they were infected, or had been brought from a place known to be infected, with contagious diseases. Then, under what is known, in law, as the power of police regulation, they might do so. And as it is known that more than ordinary danger exists in the handling and distribution of this class of goods than in first-hand goods, the city or town might require them to be subjected to a process of fumigation, as a kind of quarantine and protection against this extra danger. All this is allowed under what is known as the police power of the government, city, or town and we do not see that plaintiff has any grounds to complain of the second ordinance, requiring her to submit her goods of this kind to fumigation. But the next ordinance, requiring her to pay a tax of $4 per month for the privilege of selling these goods, falls under the law of taxation. The police power of the city has nothing to do with it. The power of taxation exists in all municipal governments. They could not exist without this power. Desty, Taxn. 50. But this power is regulated and restricted by the Constitution, and also by the acts creating municipalities. All taxes levied on property must be ad valorem and uniform. Const. art. 5, § 3. This section also authorizes the taxation of trades, professions, etc., and does not in terms provide that they shall be uniform. But this court, in construing this section of the Constitution, has held that it means that this tax shall be uniform. Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119. And the question presented is, Is this uniform tax levied for the purpose of revenue to support the city government, or is it an attempt to do by taxation what it has no right to do under its police power,—destroy this business in the city of Newbern? This is a business in which persons of small means are most likely to engage, as it does not require much capital to carry it on. And it is easy to see that a tax upon the privilege of carrying on any mercantile business, of nearly one third of the capital per annum, will destroy it. And while it is the duty of the court to attribute good motives to the city authorities, and to put such a construction upon their legislation as to sustain its legality, if it is susceptible of such construction, it is equally the duty of the court not to sustain them if it appears that their acts are in contravention of the Constitution, or of well-defined personal rights. Treating this, as we must treat it, as purely an act for revenue, we cannot see why persons engaged in the sale of this kind of merchandise shall pay four times as much for the privilege as those engaged in selling first-hand clothing. And taking into consideration the three ordinances referred to above, it is apparent to us that the purpose of this legislation was to run this business out of the trade in Newbern, and in coming to this conclusion we do not attribute bad motives to the city fathers who passed these ordinances. We suppose they thought it would be a good thing for the city to do so. But we only hold that there are legal reasons why they cannot do so.

But is this tax uniform, as required by the Constitution, and construed in Gatlin v. Tarboro, supra? It is seriously contended that it is: and State v. Worth, 116 N. C. 1007; State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 714, and State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 731, are cited as authorities to sustain this contention. And, while this case presents an interesting question, involving constitutional powers and personal rights, it seems to us that it is distinguishable from the cases cited for defendant. State v. Stevenson was for not returning purchases as required by the revenue act, for the reason, as he claimed, that he was protected by the law of interstate commerce. State v. Moore was an indictment for selling thirteen pounds of cotton after night, without complying with the terms required by the statute, and was sustained by this court upon the ground that it fell within the lines of the police powers of the state, which, we have seen, have nothing to do with the case now under consideration. State v. Worth was an indictment for violating an ordinance of the city of Wilmington putting a tax on all manufacturers of ice, who also should have the privilege of selling at wholesale or retail. And this court held that the ordinance was constitutional, that manufacturers of ice were a distinct class, and that the tax applied to all such manufacturers alike; and, nothing more appearing to the court, the ordinance was sustained. It was contended in that case that "manufacturer" was a generic term, and the same tax should be put on all manufacturers,—on the shoemaker at his bench; on the manufacturer of steam engines or of ice,—to make the tax uniform. The court did not agree to this proposition, and it is claimed that the decision in Worth's Case is, in effect, an adjudication of this case in favor of the defendant. We do not think so. There must be a line drawn somewhere, or that beneficent provision of the Constitution requiring uniformity of taxation will be emasculated and destroyed. It may be that Worth's Case is as far as we ought to go. But whether this be so or not, there seems to be quite a distinction between it and the one under consideration. It is true that "manufacturer" is a generic term, but this is subdivided into many kinds of manufacturers, such as a manufacturer of cotton, of tobacco, of steam engines, farming implements, and so many others that the generic term, "manufacturer" does not amount to a definition, and one gets no definite information as to the business in which the party is engaged from this general term.

It is contended that "merchant" is a generic name, and includes all persons who buy and sell goods of any kind; that a man who sells liquor or drugs or horses is a merchant. So he may be in the broad, "generic" sense. But they have another well-defined cognomen. If you were asked as to the business of a druggist, you would not be likely to say he is a merchant in Raleigh. If you were to ask as to what business B was engaged in, and he was a liquor dealer, you would not be likely to say he is a merchant in Morganton. Or, if you were asked as to the business of C., who owns a livery stable, and buys and sells horses, you would not be likely to say he is one of the merchants of Newbern. But, if you were asked as to the plaintiff's business, you would most likely say she is a merchant in Newbern. That would convey the business definition as to her occupation. You would be no more likely to go on and say that she has a mixed stock of goods of first-hand clothing and second-hand clothing, than you would be likely to say that Sherill & Co., of Statesville, carry a general line of merchandise, also ready-made clothing and family groceries. Such definitions as these would not likely be given unless specially called for, by some one interested in knowing more about the business than simply to know whether he was a merchant. It is admitted that, in order to sustain this legislation on the part of defendant, treating it simply as a revenue act, it may make the same distinction and discrimination against any merchant in Newbern who sells shoes as a part of his stock, or who sells tobacco as a part of his stock, or who sells first-hand clothing as a part of his stock: and without enumerating further, that they may select any article of merchandise and discriminate against the merchant who sells it 400 per cent, if they choose to do so. And it is contended there is no Constitution, no law, and no power to protect the unfortunate merchant from such unjust discrimination. We cannot give our assent to such a proposition; and as it is admitted that, unless the term "merchant" can be thus chopped up, the tax imposed by this ordinance is not uniform, I therefore think that there is error.

Faircloth, Ch. J.: I concur in the dissenting opinion.

Mr. Thomas Seay for appellee.

Head, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is whether the writings appearing in evidence constitute such a memorandum of a contract of sale of the lots by Breen to Mrs. White as satisfies the statute of frauds. Breen was the owner of lot numbered 4 in block numbered 72, situated on Montgomery avenue, and lots numbered 4 and 5 in block numbered 96, situated on Annapolis avenue, in the city of Sheffield, Colbert county, Ala. He owned no other property in that city. On November 6, 1890, he wrote from New Kingston, Pa., to W. H. Ruffin, Esq. of Sheffield, as follows:

Would you be kind enough to hunt up a purchaser for my property in Sheffield, Ala.? I will sell at a reasonable price. Hoping to hear from you on the subject soon, I remain yours truly, Albert Breen.

Ruffin replied that he was not a real-estate agent, but, if he (Breen) desired, he would secure the service of an agent in whose hands he would place the property for sale, to which he received the following reply, written from New Kingston, November 13, 1890:

Your favor of the 8th came to hand last evening. I wish you would please secure the services of some good reliable person to sell my property at any sum above five thousand dollars ($5,000), nothing less. . . . Please start the sale as soon as you can, and oblige yours truly, Albert Breen.

Thereupon Ruffin placed the above described lots (which, as we have said, were the only property owned by Breen in Sheffield) in the hands of A. J. Moses, a real-estate agent, and so notified Breen by letter. In the latter part of November, 1890, Breen came to Sheffield, when Ruffin introduced him to Moses as the person in whose hands he had placed the sale of the property. Thus the writings to this point, without the aid of extrinsic evidence, place Breen's property in Sheffield, Ala., by his act, in the hands of Moses, as his agent, for the purpose of finding a purchaser. On December 9, 1890, Moses wrote Breen, from Sheffield, as follows:

I have a customer who will take the property, viz., lot on Montgomery ave. and the two lots and improvements on Annapolis ave., for $5,000, at $1,666.66 payable January 1st, 1891, balance in twelve months. He will, if you desire, pay down $100 to close the trade; this sum to be deducted from cash payment. Reply at once. Yours, etc.,

A. J. Moses.

To this letter Breen replied as follows:

Birmingham, Ala., December 14th, 1890.
A. J. Moses, Esq., Sheffield, Ala.:

I returned this morning from Greensboro, Ala., where I have been on business. Your letter of Dec. 9th was handed to me on my arrival here this morning. I regret very much, indeed, that I was not here when it came. I will accept the trade if $100 are paid down as a security. Hope you can make a trade with same party. Hoping to hear from you soon on the subject. Address as before.

Very truly,
Albert Breen.

To which Moses replied as follows:

Sheffield, Ala., Dec. 16th, 1890.
Albert Breen, Esq.—Dear Sir:

I have closed with Mrs. W. S. White for the sale of the two houses on Annapolis avenue and lot on Montgomery avenue for $5,000, as follows: $100 cash; $1,566.66 payable January 1st, 1891; $3,333.33 payable in twelve months. I wish you to have deeds forwarded so as to execute new deeds and mortgage. The former will have to be sent to Mrs. Breen for her signature, so you had better not delay forwarding papers to my address, and state where new deeds will reach you for signature. I hold $100 to confirm trade.

Very truly,
A. J. Moses.

To this, Breen replied, by telegraph, as follows:

Birmingham, Ala., Dec. 17th, 1890. 9.45.
To A. J. Moses:

Yours all received, and contents noted. Have sent for deeds. Shall forward as soon as received. Let me know if mortgage is to bear interest. See if Ruffin got letter for me at Cleveland House, and forward the same.

Albert Breen.

To which Moses replied by letter, as follows:

Sheffield, Ala., Dec. 17th, 1890.

Mr. Albert Breen,—Dear Sir:

Your telegram received. Mr. Ruffin forwarded your letter yesterday. While nothing was said in reference to interest on deferred payment, it is customary, and I so understand it, as custom in every case shows deferred payments bear interest, particularly where property is improved and producing an income.

Very truly,

A. J. Moses.

On the next day, December 18th, Breen, by a message to Moses, through a letter to Ruffin, repudiated, or attempted to repudiate, the trade, on the ground that his wife would not sign at such a low figure, to which Moses replied by letter on the 20th, insisting that he (Breen) was bound, and urging him to carry out the contract. On the 26th, he wrote Moses, expressing a willingness to close the trade by executing the papers and accepting a mortgage, but exacting 8 per cent interest on the deferred payments, to which he thereafter adhered. Mrs. White refused to submit to this exaction of interest, and brought this action to recover for the alleged breach of agreement to sell. When Moses made the bargain with Mrs. White relied on, she paid him $100 in cash, and he executed to her a receipt, as follows:

Sheffield, Ala., Dec. 15th, 1890.

Received from Mrs. Mary T. White one hundred dollars, on account of purchase of two houses and lots on Annapolis avenue and one lot on Montgomery avenue, belonging to Albert Breen.

A. J. Moses, Agent.

The foregoing are the material facts. Upon them, two questions arise: (1) Did Moses, as agent of Breen, make a contract of sale binding upon his principal? (2) Did Breen himself make such a contract binding him to its performance? The first question subdivides itself into two inquiries, viz.: (1) Was Moses lawfully authorized, in writing, by Breen, to make the contract? (2) If so, do the writings show that, in pursuance of such authority, he made a contract, evidenced by some note or memorandum thereof, in writing, expressing the consideration, and subscribed by him?

The principles of law growing out of our statute of frauds, in reference to contracts for the sale of land or any interest therein, have been often and fully discussed in our adjudications. It is well settled that the form of the writing required by the statute is not material. The contract may be evidenced by one writing or more. It may be shown entirely by written correspondence. Whatever form the agreement may assume, if the writing or writings, viewed as a whole, constitute, in essence or substance upon their face, a note or memorandum in writing, subscribed by the party sought to be charged, or his agent lawfully authorized in writing, showing who the contracting parties are, the subject-matter of the sale, and the consideration, the statute is satisfied. Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 357; Carter v. Shorter, 57 Ala. 253; Knox v. King, 36 Ala. 369. In cases of single instruments their sufficiency is generally of easy determination. Greater difficulties arise when, in cases like the present, the required evidence of the contract is sought to be produced by the adjustment and adaptation to each other of several letters and writings containing the negotiations of the parties, and the supposed culmination of these negotiations in a binding agreement of sale. In cases of this character it is certainly not essential that the party charged should have subscribed each paper forming a link in the chain of evidence. If the several writings, upon their faces, viewed in the light of the situation and circumstances of the parties at the time they were written, clearly relate to, and connect themselves with, each other, and when their contents are adjusted, and adapted to each other, according to their reasonable and practical import, involving in form and order the manifest sense and meaning of the parties, there appears to have been clearly made known the names of the contracting parties, the subject-matter of the sale, and the consideration, and if it appears that all this has received the sanction of the subscription of the party sought to be charged, or some person by him thereunto lawfully authorized in writing, the statute requirement in reference to subscription, as well as all other particulars, is met. We said the several writings must, upon their faces, clearly relate to, and connect themselves with, each other. The rule, however, does not necessarily require express mention in one document of another, or in each of all the others; and this statement, we conceive, does not modify the rule, when properly interpreted, as it is stated in Knox v. King, 36 Ala. 367, viz.: "When the memorandum in writing is itself incomplete, it cannot derive aid from another writing unless the memorandum refer to the other writing;" and that "oral evidence cannot be received to connect the two or to supply the wanting link." This last rule is subject to the exception which obtains generally in the construction of written contracts,—that the situation and circumstances of the parties may be looked to, when necessary, to aid in arriving at the meaning of what they have written. An explanation of these rules will be found in Jenkins v. Harrison, supra. We are of opinion that when all the writings adduced, viewed together, in the light of the situation and circumstances of the parties at the time they were written, show unmistakably that they relate to the same matter and constitute several parts of one connected transaction, so that the mind can come to no other reasonable conclusion, from the evidence so afforded, than that they were each written with reference to those concurrent or preceding, then there is such a reference of the one to the other as satisfies the rule, although reference in express terms does not appear. The rule is one founded in reason; and when, as practical men, we look at the writings, and see, inhering in them, evidence which entirely satisfies the mind that they all relate to one general transaction, there is no reason why they should not be so considered. There is in such case a direct reference of the one to the other, within the meaning of the law. The application of the principle to the facts of this case will illustrate our meaning. The case of Beckwith v. Talbot, 95 U. S. 289, 24 L. ed. 496, aptly illustrates it.

These rules of law relating to the form of the agreement, and by which several papers may be considered as bearing a connection with each other, apply as well to the creation of a power of attorney to sell lands as to the requisite note or memorandum of the contract of sale; but in other respects the characteristics of the two (the power of attorney, and the note or memorandum of the contract) are essentially different, and controlled by different principles. Unlike the former, the present statute requires the authority of an agent to subscribe the note or memorandum of the contract for the sale of land for his principal to be conferred in writing. No form or method of execution of the power of attorney is prescribed. It may be in any form clearly showing the agent's authority, and be executed according to any recognized common-law method of executing written instruments. The power may be general, to sell any lands of the principal to any purchaser upon any terms; or it may be partly general and partly special or limited, as to sell particular land to any purchaser on any terms, or particular land to any purchaser on particular terms; or it may be entirely special, as to sell particular land to a particular purchaser on particular terms. In either case, the agent, keeping within the scope of his authority, may make the contract and execute the necessary written evidence binding his principal to its performance.

We think it is not to be denied that, if the lands were sufficiently identified, Breen did execute to Moses a power of attorney to sell these lands. Let us settle, first, whether the identification was sufficient. The power to sell is contained in the letter of Moses to Breen of December 9, 1890, and Breen's direct reply thereto, expressly referring to it, of December 14, 1890. These letters are above set out. In them, the only description given is "the property, viz., lot on Montgomery ave. and the two lots and improvements on Annapolis ave." This, unaided, is clearly insufficient. Is it rendered sufficient by other writings? Here the principles herein discussed, touching the manifestation of agreements by several writings and reference to and connection with each other, are applicable. We have seen that on November 6, 1890, Breen wrote to Ruffin requesting him to hunt him up a purchaser for "my property in Sheffield, Ala." Ruffin replied that he was not a real estate agent, but that, if he (Breen) desired, he would secure the services of an agent in whose hands he would place "the property" for sale. Breen replied on November 13, 1890, expressly referring to Ruffin's letter, saying: "Please secure the services of some good reliable person to sell my property," etc. Thereupon Ruffin wrote to Breen, informing him that, pursuant to instructions, he had placed in the hands of A. J. Moses lot numbered 4 in block numbered 72, and lots numbered 4 and 5 in block numbered 96, the former being on Montgomery avenue, the two latter on Annapolis avenue, all in the city of Sheffield, county of Colbert, and state of Alabama. The bill of exceptions leaves no room for any other interpretation than that this letter of Ruffin to Breen described the property he had placed in the hands of Moses as above stated. It was also proved that Breen was so circumstanced at that time that he owned no other property in Sheffield. Following close upon this correspondence came the letter of Moses to Breen, of December 9, saying he had a customer who would take "the property, viz., lot on Montgomery ave.," etc.; to which Breen replied, conferring authority to sell. This letter of Moses does not expressly refer to the Ruffin correspondence, but, in pointing out the property to which it relates, he employs the definite article, implying, beyond all doubt, some precedent matter understood by both, which rendered a more definite reference unnecessary. It also gives the avenues on which the lots are situated. It is impossible, we think, for the mind to conclude that this letter did not have direct reference to the precedent correspondence between Breen and Ruffin, though express reference to that correspondence was omitted. We accordingly hold that the correspondence with Ruffin properly enters into the make-up of Moses' power of attorney, and, with the other letters, renders sufficient the identification of the property authorized to be sold. The result would be the same if the last letter of Ruffin to Breen had not minutely described the lands as above set forth. In that case the description afforded by bringing together the several letters would be, substantially: "The three lots in Sheffield, Alabama, belonging to Albert Breen, viz, the one located on Montgomery avenue and the two on Annapolis avenue;" the proof being that Breen then owned no other property in Sheffield than the lots in question. This is a sufficient description. See authorities cited on brief of appellant's counsel.

What then were the nature and effect of this power of attorney. It was of the class we designated as entirely special and limited. The authority was to sell the particular lots, to the particular customer, at a specified price, and on specified terms. The judgment and discretion of Breen, in respect of every element of the bargain, were expressed in the power, and were to be exercised by the agent. Indeed, this power of attorney, save in a single particular, contains within itself a statement of every element of the contract requisite to a sufficient note or memorandum, under the statute of frauds. It fails only in that the name of the purchaser is not stated. She is pointed to the agent, not by name, but as the customer who had proposed to buy. This, as we have shown, while insufficient as evidence of the contract, because it does not disclose the name of the purchaser, was sufficient for the purposes of Moses' power to sell to Mrs. White; she being in fact the customer referred to. It authorized him to close the bargain, and execute to her the necessary note or memorandum under the statute; and, if the receipt he executed to her had set forth the lands, the price, and the terms of sale, there could be no further question of its binding force upon Breen, the principal. But it omitted these essentials, and the question arises whether they are supplied by reference to the power of attorney which sets them forth. The receipt itself discloses all other essentials, viz., the names of the contracting parties. The receipt was subscribed by the agent thereunto lawfully authorized in writing. The power of attorney was subscribed by Breen himself. The two combined express all the elements of the contract required by the statute. Neither of itself does. The principles of law growing out of that provision of the statute under consideration, as we have already remarked, have been often discussed in this court. We can go to no better source of information on the subject than the elaborate and able opinion of Chief Justice Brickell in Jenkins v. Harrison, supra. We will not enlarge this opinion by reproducing what he there said. We extract from it, and from the books at large, that the purpose from which a note or memorandum relied on was made is not always controlling. "Writings, even letters addressed to third persons, of which the party availing himself as evidence had no knowledge when they were written, and which were not written with any view to the execution, or to furnish evidence of the contract, have been received as evidence to meet the requirements of the statute of frauds, and, upon the evidence derived from them, the contract enforced." Undelivered deeds, deeds delivered in escrow, may furnish the necessary evidence of the contract. In short, all that the law demands is a written statement of the essential elements of the contract over the signature of the party sought to be charged or his duly-authorized agent, so that the establishment of the contract be not left to oral evidence. When an agent contracts, for his principal, with another under written authority, the writing, in contemplation of law, is before the parties at the time the contract is made. They are bound to know its contents. The contract derives validity from the power. If the agent executes written evidence of the contract, the power of attorney enters into and forms a part of it. The two constitute a unity, and are inseparable. Under the power, in the present case, Moses was authorized to execute a full and complete note or memorandum, binding Breen. That cannot be disputed. If so, then he was authorized to execute such a note or memorandum as, under the particular circumstances, was necessary to the production of full written evidence of the contract, under the statute. Hence, when called upon to act, he found that Breen had himself defined, over his own signature, the vendor, the land, the price, and terms of sale, in a writing which must needs enter into and become part of any writing he (the agent) could execute; thus furnishing all the evidence of what the contract was, except the name of the purchaser; and, being thereunto duly authorized in writing, he executed the receipt, supplying that deficiency. We have no doubt that this was a full compliance with the statute. Full legal evidence of the contract was thereby provided.

We stated for decision the second question, viz., whether Breen did not himself conclude the contract of sale after Mrs. White was reported to him as purchaser. We deem it, however, unnecessary to decide it, as the views we have announced are evidently conclusive of the plaintiff's right of action. Reversed and remanded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Minnesota, ex rel. William CORCORAN, Appt.,
v.
Charles E. CHAPEL, Respt.

(.....Minn.....)

The provision of Gen. Laws 1893, chap. 124, § 9, as amended by Gen. Laws 1895, chap. 115, § 5, that "it shall be unlawful for any person to consign by common carrier to any commission merchant or sale market, at any time, any elk, moose, caribou, or deer, or any part thereof except the head or skin," is valid, and not in violation of either the state or Federal Constitution.

(February 6, 1896.)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from the custody of defendant, sheriff of Ramsey County, to which he had been committed upon conviction of violating the game laws. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

*Headnote by MITCHELL, J.

Messrs. Akers & Williams, for appellant:

By law of the land is meant a general and public law, operating equally upon every individual in the community.

Messrs. W. E. Bramhall and Pierce Butler for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order of the district court denying the petition of the relator, on a writ of habeas corpus, for his discharge from the custody of the respondent, as sheriff of Ramsey county.

The relator is held under a commitment issued upon a conviction of a violation of Gen. Laws 1893, chap. 124, § 9, as amended by Gen. Laws 1895, chap. 115, § 5, which provides that "it shall be unlawful for any person to consign by common carrier to any commission merchant or sale market, at any time, any elk, moose, caribou, or deer, or any part thereof except the skin or head." He claims that this provision is unconstitutional, as class legislation, and is in violation of both the Federal and state Constitutions, because it deprives the citizen of his privileges and property without due process of law. An analysis of the provision shows that there is no discrimination between persons in the matter of killing game, or in the use or transportation of it after it is killed. Any one may kill or buy it during the open season, and every one is allowed equal privileges for shipping it after it is thus acquired; also, when a common carrier is not used as the means of transportation, every one is allowed to ship it to any one for any purpose; also that, when it is not consigned to a commission merchant or sale market, any means of transportation, either a common or a private carrier, may be used. The only restriction is that, when consigned to a commission merchant or sale market,—that is, to one handling game for sale,—it cannot be consigned by a common carrier. In its practical working, the only effect of the law is to limit the means of transportation of game killed for the market, and consigned to commission men for sale, either for themselves or on account of the consignors. The result would be to prevent, in a great measure, such game from becoming an article of general commerce, and thereby materially decrease the amount killed. The object of the statute, as its title indicates, is to protect and preserve the game of the state from extinction or undue depletion. The most usual method adopted to effect such an object is to limit in some way the amount of game killed. One way of accomplishing this is to limit the open season. But this is not always effectual; for, even if the open season is reduced to the shortest reasonable period, the number of hunters, especially those who hunt for the market, may be so great as to unduly deplete the game even during that period. Another method resorted to is to limit the amount that any one person may kill, and to restrict the modes of killing. Experience proves that such provisions are difficult to enforce, because of the difficulty of procuring the evidence of their violation, especially in the case of large game, which is usually killed in the secrecy of the forest.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the rapid depletion of game, especially large game, such as deer, is caused by its indiscriminate slaughter by "pot hunters," who kill it for the general market. The practical question which confronted the legislature was how to prevent the undue depletion of such game from this cause. This could only be done by adopting some means that would, as far as possible, prevent the game from becoming a subject of commerce in the general market, and thereby reduce the amount that would reach such market. It is also a matter of common knowledge that the facilities for regular, rapid, and cheap transportation furnished by common carriers, especially railways, are practically essential to the business of these pot hunters, and furnish its chief stimulant and aid, and that, without this method of transportation, hunting for the general market would be quite limited, and the amount of game killed very much reduced. Hence, the enactment of the provision under consideration. The legislature has a very large discretion in such cases as to the means to be adopted to effect the desired object, and, if these means do not violate any constitutional provision, the courts will never set up their judgment against that of the legislature as to whether they are the best or most equitable means that might have been adopted. Neither will the courts declare a law invalid, unless it is in plain violation of some express provision of the Constitution. All reasonable doubts must be solved in favor of the legislative action.

The provision under consideration certainly has a natural and reasonable tendency to preserve the game of the state from extinction or undue depletion, and we cannot say that the restriction upon the method of transporting game consigned to commission men or sale markets is arbitrary, or not founded upon an apparent natural reason, suggested by the necessities of the case. If the law is otherwise unobjectionable, the mere fact that, in its operation, it may incidentally deprive common carriers of some business which they would otherwise get, or may render it more difficult for those to procure game in the market who live at a distance from those parts of the state where it is killed, will not render the law invalid. If this restriction was sought to be applied to some article in which the citizen had an absolute and unlimited right of private property, it could not be sustained. But wild game, before it is reduced to possession, belongs to the state in its sovereign capacity, in trust for the whole public. Hence, in the exercise of it police power, the state may impose such limitations and restrictions upon the right of property in it, after it is taken or killed, as will tend to prevent its extermination or undue depletion. State v. Rodman, 58 Minn. 393. One who kills a deer does not acquire an absolute and unlimited right of property in it. His right of property, from its very inception, is subject to all the limitations imposed upon it by the police laws of the state, one of which is the restriction upon the mode of transportation under consideration. Hence, no question of taking private property without due process of law is involved.

Order affirmed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

Ex parte Edward SENIOR, Jr.

(.....Fla.....)

1. The rule stated in Ex parte Edwards, 11 Fla. 174, that in the absence of statutory limitations or restrictions the power of the several courts over contempt is omnipotent and its exercise is not to be inquired into by any other tribunal, is subject to the qualification that the conduct charged as constituting the contempt must be such that some degree of delinquency or misbehavior can be predicated of it, for if the act be plainly indifferent or meritorious, or if it be only the assertion of an undoubted right of the party, it will not become a criminal contempt by being adjudged to be so.

2. The ancient maxim of the common law, "Nemo tenetur seipsum prodere," is imbedded in the provision in the 12th section of the Bill of Rights of our Constitution, that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; and such provision should be broadly and liberally construed, to secure the protection designed to be accomplished by it.

3. The purpose of the provision mentioned is to exempt one from being compelled, in any judicial or other proceeding against himself, or upon the trial of issues or investigation of facts between others, to disclose facts or circumstances that can be used against him as admissions tending to prove guilt or connection with any criminal offense of which he may then or afterwards be charged, or the sources from which or the means by which evidence of its commission or his connection with it may be obtained.

4. The right of privilege against disclosure of incriminatory statements or evidence is personal to the witness, he alone being entitled to invoke its protection, and it may be waived by him.

5. While the witness must judge of the effect of his answer, and should not be required to explain how it will criminate him, yet the court must determine, under all the circumstances of the case, whether such will be its tendency from the question asked; and where, from the nature of the investigation and the character of the testimony sought, it reasonably appears that the answer may criminate, or tend to criminate, the witness has the right to claim his privilege, and is not bound to answer.

6. The court should inform a witness of his right of privilege when the circumstances of the case call for it, but when he, with full knowledge of his rights, consents to testify about the very matter that may criminate him, without claiming his privilege, he must submit to a full, legitimate cross-examination in reference thereto.

7. Section 2787, Rev. Stat., providing that whoever casts knowingly an illegal vote at an election in this state held according to law shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100, applies to illegal voting at municipal elections in this state; and a party who votes at such an election is not compelled to testify as to his vote when examined as a witness in a suit involving the validity of the election; but if, with full knowledge of his rights, he consents to testify that he did vote, and his ballot was received by the judges and inspectors of the election, he must submit to a full cross-examination as to his qualifications as a voter.

APPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure petitioner's discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Escambia County to which he had been committed for contempt in refusing to answer questions propounded to him as a witness in a quo warranto proceeding. Petitioner remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blount & Blount, C. B. Parkhill, and John Eagan, for petitioner:

Habeas corpus lies, when upon the admitted facts the court did not have the legal right to make the order, or when, in disobeying it, the person committed was in the exercise of a constitutional right.

People, Hackley, v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74; People, Tweed, v. Liscomb, 60 N. Y. 559, 19 Am. Rep. 211; Re Dill, 32 Kan. 668, 49 Am. Rep. 505; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 218.

In such case the court may have jurisdiction of the person and of that offense, but it has no authority to make the particular order complained of.

People, Tweed, v. Liscomb, supra; Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872.

The witness had a right to refuse to answer.

Fla. Const. § 12, Declaration of Rights.

The privilege is one which the witness may claim at any stage, and even though he has answered other questions about the same matter.

Reg. v. Garbett, 2 Car. & K. 474, 1 Den. C. C. 236; Foster v. People, 18 Mich. 266; Counselman v. Hitchcock, supra.

The witness who consents to testify to one thing does not waive his privilege to refuse to testify unless he has already so testified as to furnish conclusive evidence of his guilt.

Foster v. People, supra.

Or unless the thing inquired about is necessary for an explanation of that which has been testified to before.

Lombard v. Mayberry, 24 Neb. 674; Amherst v. Hollis, 9 N. H. 107; Coburn v. Odell, 30 N. H. 540; Taylor v. McIrvin, 94 Ill. 488; People, Taylor, v. Forbes, 143 N. Y. 219.

The transaction of voting was a complete thing in itself, and the testimony sought was not to explain it, but to impeach it, and was sought for the sole purpose of showing the witness to be a felon. Questions which related to distinct transactions at other times and places and having no connection with this act were not admissible.

Ex parte Boscowitz, 84 Ala. 463; People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 229, 21 Am. Dec. 122; Amherst v. Hollis, and People, Hackley, v. Kelly, supra; People v. Sharp, 107 N. This privilege cannot be waived.

Higdon v. Heard, 14 Ga. 255.

Messrs. John C. Avery, S. R. Mallory, John S. Beard, and C. M. Jones, for respondent:

This court will not review such order by appeal or writ of error.

Caro v. Maxwell, 20 Fla. 17.

The power of the several courts over the matter of contempt is omnipotent.

Ex parte Edwards, 11 Fla. 174.

It is the province of the court to pass upon the tendency to criminate of the question which the witness refused to answer.

9 Crim. L. Mag. & Rep. 301; Richman v. State, 2 G. Greene, 532; State v. Duffy, 15 Iowa, 425; Com. v. Braynard, Thacher, Crim. Cas. 147; Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140.

It does not appear that the witness gave to the court any intimation as to how any of the questions not answered would elicit testimony which would incriminate him. Under such circumstances the judgment of the trial judge should prevail.

Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311, 9 Week. Rep. 960.

In case the witness had complied with the court's order, after asserting his privilege, the evidence would be regarded as given under compulsion and could not thereafter be used against him.

Thompson, Trials, § 310; Reg. v. Garbett, 2 Car. & K. 474.

The preliminary question, Can any answer responsive to the question subject the witness to a criminal prosecution?—must be decided by the court and not by the witness. If the court holds the affirmative of that question then the witness has a right to decide whether the answer he would give to the question would have such effect.

9 Crim. L. Mag. & Rep. 302.

In England a witness may not there use his privilege arbitrarily to make a partial statement of facts to the prejudice of either party, as this petitioner tried to do.

East v. Chapman, Moody & M. 47; Austin v. Prince, 1 Sim. 348; Dixon v. Vale, 1 Car. & P. 279.

The American rule is that if the witness voluntarily discloses a part of a transaction tending to criminate him he waives his privilege and must answer freely and disclose the whole.

The court may in a proper case strike out from the evidence the circumstance or fact stated, but will not permit it to stand as the whole truth.

Pinkard v. State, 30 Ga. 757; Dandridge v. Corden, 3 Car. & P. 11.

In an action to try title to office a witness cannot be compelled to testify whether he voted, when the evidence would tend to criminate him.

State, Hopkins, v. Olin, 23 Wis. 309.

Mabry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The return of the sheriff to the writ of habeas corpus shows that on the 17th day of February, 1896, pending the trial of a case in quo warranto proceedings instituted in the name of the attorney general on the relation of William E. Anderson against Pat. McHugh—the issue being whether the said Anderson or McHugh had received the highest number of votes at an election for mayor of the city of Pensacola held in said city on the 4th day of June, 1895—the petitioner, Ed. Senior, Jr., was called and sworn as a witness for respondent McHugh, and having been advised by the court that he need not testify to any fact tending to convict him of crime, testified, in reply to questions by respondent's counsel, that he voted at said election, in election precinct 13, for Pat. McHugh for mayor, and that his ballot was received by the inspectors. Thereupon, being turned over to the state for cross-examination, the following questions were propounded to said witness, viz.:

Where were you living at the time you cast your ballot?

How long had you been living at that place?

At what place were you living at the time of the last city election?

Did you have a certificate of registration?

Where were you born?

Were you born in the United States?

Did you ever take out any naturalization papers?

Are you twenty-one years of age?

How long have you been living in the state of Florida?

How long have you been living in the county of Escambia?

How long have you been living in the city of Pensacola?

Were you ever registered?

Did you take any oath?

Thereupon he refused to answer either of said questions, upon the ground that the answers would tend to criminate him, and the court deciding that the witness should answer the questions, and ordering him to make answers thereto, and still persisting in his refusal, he was adjudged to be in contempt of court, and ordered to pay a fine and stand committed to the custody of the sheriff until the fine was paid. Upon the refusal of the witness to pay the fine he was taken into custody by the sheriff, and still remaining in custody, has sued out a writ of habeas corpus and asks to be discharged.

A suggestion comes in limine from counsel opposed to the writ that the court will not review, on habeas corpus, an order made by the circuit court adjudging a person guilty of contempt. Reference is made to the decision in Caro v. Maxwell, 20 Fla. 17, holding that a contempt order will not be reviewed on appeal or writ of error, and also to the language used in Ex parte Edwards, 11 Fla. 174, "that in the absence of any statutory limitations or restrictions, the power of the several courts over contempts is omnipotent, and its exercise is not to be inquired into by any other tribunal. This is the great bulwark established by the common law for the protection of courts of justice, and for the maintenance of their dignity, authority, and efficiency, and neither in England nor in the United States has this unrestricted power been seriously questioned." The first case referred to has no application here, as we have no writ of error or appeal to review an order of a circuit court in a contempt matter. The rule announced in the second case is not now questioned, but its application must be confined to proper limits. As a general rule habeas corpus does not lie to correct mere irregularities of procedure where there is jurisdiction, and in order to sustain the writ there must be illegality or want of jurisdiction. Ex parte Pitts, 35 Fla. 149; Ex parte Prince, 27 Fla. 196; Ex parte Bowen, 25 Fla. 214. When a person has been taken into custody under an order of a court exercising proper jurisdiction, a habeas corpus to discharge the person so taken involves a collateral attack on the order under which he is held, and well-established rules forbid an investigation into matters of mere irregularity in procedure. But illegality in matter of law or want of jurisdiction may be inquired into and the decision of the lower court, as to such matter, is not conclusive. The following language taken from People, Hackley, v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74,—a contempt proceeding,—is expressive of our view on the subject, viz.: "But this rule is of course subject to the qualification that the conduct charged as constituting the contempt must be such that some degree of delinquency or misbehavior can be predicated of it; for if the act be plainly indifferent or meritorious, or if it be only the assertion of the undoubted right of the party, it will not become a criminal contempt by being adjudged to be so. The question whether the alleged offender really committed the act charged will be conclusively determined by the order or judgment of the court; and so with equivocal acts, which may be culpable or innocent according to the circumstances; but where the act is necessarily innocent or justifiable, it would be preposterous to hold it a cause of imprisonment. Hence, if the refusal of Mr. Hackley, the relator, to answer the question propounded to him, was only an assertion of a right secured to every person by the Constitution, it was illegal to commit him for a contempt." It cannot certainly be true that the decision of an inferior court adjudging a matter to be a contempt precludes all investigation as to the legality or proper authority of the court to make such order; and, on the other hand, it must not be forgotten that in such matters when the court is acting within the sphere of its legitimate powers the appellate tribunal will not undertake to review the correctness of conclusions as to matters of fact or questions of mere procedure. Re Dill, 32 Kan. 668, 49 Am. Rep. 505.

In the present case there was a refusal to answer questions propounded in open court during the trial of a cause within the jurisdiction of the circuit court to hear and determine, and the refusal was placed upon the ground that the answers to the questions would tend to criminate the party to whom the questions were propounded. If, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the party questioned had a clear constitutional or legal right to insist on his privilege not to answer the questions on the ground stated, it would be illegal to adjudge him in contempt for refusing to answer, and hence it becomes necessary for us to see if such right of privilege as claimed in the circuit court did exist as a matter of law. The ground of the refusal to answer the questions propounded was that the answers thereto would tend to criminate the petitioner, and what we have to say in this opinion will be confined to such ground of privilege.

It is an ancient maxim of the law that no man shall be compelled to criminate himself. The origin and necessity of this maxim, as others of the common law, grew out of conditions found in the early history of English jurisprudence in reference to the administration of criminal law, and which, it must be admitted, evince many traces of cruelty and barbarity. There was a time when suspected persons were not only deprived of an opportunity to have witnesses produced in their favor, and of the advice and aid of counsel, but were put to torture for the purpose of extorting from them confessions of guilt, or statements which could be used in securing their conviction. Securing the conviction of even suspected persons by such means, justly became odious, and we find the humanity of the common law proclaiming that no man shall be compelled to criminate himself—Nemo tenetur seipsum prodere. This principle of the common law was fully recognized in this country when the formation of governments began, and we find it imbedded in the national and all the state Constitutions that we have examined. In our Constitution it is found in the 12th section of the Bill of Rights, that "no person shall be subject to be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, nor compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken without just compensation." The provision that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, should be broadly and liberally construed to secure the protection designed to be accomplished by it, and to this end no technical limitation should be placed upon the terms employed. The terms "in any criminal case" might on casual reading be taken to confine the protection against self-accusation to investigations in criminal cases, but such is not the true meaning. Our constitutional provision is the same as those found in the Constitutions of the United States and of the state of New York, as well as other states, and the cases of Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, and People, Taylor, v. Forbes, 143 N. Y. 219, clearly demonstrate that a broad and liberal construction of such provisions should obtain in furtherance of the right sought to be secured. In the first case cited it is said that the privilege is limited to criminal matters, but it is as broad as the mischief against which it seeks to guard. "The object was to insure that a person should not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which might tend to show that he himself had committed a crime." In the New York case, after stating that the matter had frequently been adjudicated both in the Federal and state courts, the following language is used, viz : "The principle established by these decisions is that no one shall be compelled in any judicial or other proceeding against himself, or upon the trial of issues between others, to disclose facts or circumstances that can be used against him as admissions tending to prove his guilt or connection with any criminal offense of which he may then or afterwards be charged, or the sources from which or the means by which evidence of its commission or of his connection with it may be obtained." A witness is exempt by his privilege from answering not only what will criminate him directly, but also what has any tendency to crim nate him, the reason being, as stated by Phillips on Evidence, vol. 2, p. 929, "because otherwise question might be put after question, and though no single question may be asked which directly criminates, yet enough might be got from him by successive questions whereon to found against him a criminal charge." In showing the extent of the immunity which a witness is entitled to claim, the foll wing language used by Chief Justice Marshall on the trial of Aaron Burr has often been quoted, viz.: "Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict an individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compelled to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible, but a probable, case that a witness by disclosing a single fact may complete the testimony against himself, and to a very effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by sta'ing every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself would be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed in his own bosom he is safe, but draw it from thence and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule that declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description."

The authorities agree that the right of privilege against compelling disclosure of incriminatory evidence is personal to the witness, he alone being entitled to invoke its protection, and that it may be waived by him. Whether the court or the witness has the right to deter mine the question of privilege, or to what extent the claim of privilege is left to the determination of the witness, has not been so uniformly stated in the decisions. It has never been recognized that he alone has the right in all cases to decide whether his answer will tend to criminate him. Such a rule would be mischievous and enable unscrupulous witnesses to defeat the ends of justice in many cases. The privilege must be claimed in good faith, and not as a shield to defeat justice. It was held in Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S 311, that to entitle a witness to the privilege of silence "the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which he is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer. Moreover, the danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable, with reference to the ordinary operation of law in the ordinary course of things." The New York court, in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 229, 21 Am. Dec. 122, stated the right of privilege to be that when the witness "claims to be excused from answering . . . the court are to determine whether the answer he may give to the question can criminate him, directly or indirectly, by furnishing direct evidence of his guilt, or by establishing one of many facts, which together may constitute a chain of testimony sufficient to warrant his conviction, but which one fact of itself could not produce such result; and if they think the answer may in any way criminate him, they must allow his privilege, without exacting from him to explain how he would be criminated by the answer which the truth may oblige him to give." To require the witness to explain how his answer would criminate him would, of course, expose him to the very danger against which the privilege was designed to protect him. In People, Taylor, v. Forbes, supra, it is said that "the weight of authority seems to be in favor of the rule that the witness may be compelled to answer when he contumaciously refuses, or when it is perfectly clear and plain that he is mistaken, and that the answer cannot possibly injure him, or tend in any degree to subject him to the peril of prosecution. But the courts have recognized the impossibility in most cases of anticipating the effect of the answer. Where it is not so perfectly evident and manifest that the answer called for cannot incriminate, as to preclude all reasonable doubt or fair argument, the privilege must be recognized and protected." While the witness must judge of the effect of his answer, and should not be required to explain how it will criminate him, yet the court must determine, under all the circumstances of the case, whether such will be its tendency from the question asked, and where, from the nature of the investigation and the character of the testimony sought, it reasonably appears that the answer may criminate or tend to criminate, the witness has the right to claim his privilege, and is not bound to answer. State v. Duffy, 15 Iowa, 425; Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140; Chamberlain v. Willson, 12 Vt. 491, 36 Am. Dec. 356; Ex parte Boscowitz, 84 Ala. 463.

As stated above, the witness may waive his privilege, but to what extent he is held to waive it by consenting to answer some questions, or at what stage of an examination he must insist on his privilege in order to avoid a waiver, is a matter in reference to which there is some considerable confusion in the application of the rule to the various cases. Mr. Phillips, in referring to the early decisions in England, says, in substance, that from the nature of the right a witness by consenting to answer some questions ought not to be barred from the right of objecting to others, but that he should not be allowed, by any arbitrary use of his privilege, to make a partial statement of facts to the prejudice of either party. And upon this principle it was ruled in Dixon v. Vale, 1 Car. & P. 278, and East v. Chapman, 2 Car. & P. 570, that if a witness waives his privilege so far as to answer part of the questions tending to subject him to an indictment, he cannot be exempted from answering the remainder, but must give the whole truth. He further states that a majority of the judges, in Reg. v. Garbett, 2 Car. & K. 474, 1 Den. C. C. 236, thought that it made no difference to the right of the witness to protection that he answered in part, but that he was entitled to it at whatever stage of the inquiry he chose to claim it, and that they did not consider themselves bound by the cases cited. 2 Phill. Ev. 935. Garbett's Case was decided in 1847, and the question arose in a criminal prosecution against the accused upon the introduction, on the part of the Crown, of his testimony on a cross-examination in a civil suit. The accused had gone a long way in his testimony towards opening up the matter in reference to which he was being prosecuted, but he refused to answer some questions pointing directly to his guilt and frequently put himself in the hands of the court for protection. The testimony was rejected in the criminal case, and several of the most eminent judges dissented. In the later editions of Greenleaf the ruling in Garbett's Case is adopted. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 451.

The American rule, following to some extent the early English cases, is said to be the other way, and that if a witness discloses a part of a transaction or conversation tending to criminate him, he waives his privilege and must answer freely, and disclose the whole transaction or conversation, unless the partial disclosure is made under an innocent mistake, or does not clearly relate to the transaction as to which he refuses to testify. In Low v. Mitchell, 18 Me. 372, it was held that if the witness consents to testify to one matter tending to criminate himself, he must testify in all respects relating to that matter, so far as material to the issue; that if he waives the privilege, he does so fully in relation to that act, but he does not thereby waive his privilege of refusing to reveal other unlawful acts, wholly unconnected with the act of which he has spoken, even though they may be material to the issue.

It seems to us that it is a just and correct rule that if a witness, with full knowledge of his rights, consents to testify about the very matter that may criminate him, without claiming his privilege, he must submit to a full, legitimate cross-examination in reference thereto. Otherwise a witness would have it in his power to make a partial statement of a matter to the detriment of one party without any adequate means of relief. The following authorities bear on the subject: Foster v. Pierce, 11 Cush. 437, 59 Am. Dec. 152; Com. v. Price, 10 Gray, 472, 71 Am. Dec. 668; Com. v. Pratt, 126 Mass. 462; Com. v. Trider, 143 Mass. 180; State v. K—, 4 N. H. 562; Amherst v. Hollis, 9 N. H. 107; State v. Foster, 23 N. H. 348, 55 Am. Dec. 191; Coburn v. Odell, 30 N. H. 540; Chamberlain v. Willson, 12 Vt. 491, 36 Am. Dec. 356; Norfolk v. Gaylord, 28 Conn. 309; People v. Freshour, 55 Cal. 375; State v. Nichols, 29 Minn. 357; Foster v. People, 18 Mich. 266; Lombard v. Mayberry, 24 Neb. 674; 2 Phill. Ev. pp. 929 et seq.

In Counselman's Case, supra, he was examined before a grand jury, and in reply to questions stated that he was a grain dealer, and had made shipments of grain over certain lines of railroad. When interrogated as to rates of freight secured less than the tariff or open rate, and as to rebates, he refused to answer. While freely admitting that he received freights over certain lines, he stated that he did not recollect of shipping over other lines mentioned. It was not insisted on the part of the government that the witness had waived his privilege by answering some questions, and the court makes no reference to this matter in its opinion, but, as the party was discharged, it is evident that the court did not consider he had waived his privilege. The privilege claimed in the case of People, Taylor, v. Forbes, supra, was also in an examination before a grand jury when the conduct of students at Cornell University was being investigated. The witness, who was a student, answered that he had no connection whatever with the transaction being investigated, but when questioned as to particular facts connected with it, he claimed his privilege and refused to answer. The court was of the opinion that the witness by answering the general questions as to his connection with the affair, whether his answers were true or false, did not waive his right to remain silent when it was sought to draw from him some fact or circumstance which in his judgment might form another link in the chain of facts, capable of being used under any circumstances to his detriment. Under the peculiar surroundings of that investigation it presented a case, in the judgment of the court, where the witness might claim his privilege as to collateral circumstances that tended to imperil him. The question presented in Amherst v. Hollis, supra, was whether or not a certain person was a pauper, and therefore a charge upon a town. The witness stated that he was destitute of property during the time for which the charge was made, and upon further inquiry admitted that he had considerable money three or four years previously, but that the money had gone to adjust matters which he could not disclose without exposing himself to criminal prosecution. After admitting the rule that a witness should not be compelled to criminate himself, and observing that there were cases in which a witness could not be heard to relate a part of a transaction, and refuse to disclose the rest, the court held that the testimony sought to be elicited, although not entirely independent of the facts the witness had testified about, was so far distinct that he was authorized to claim the privilege. The court said that "when asked, in the first place, if he was destitute of property, there is no obvious propriety in his alleging that he could not disclose that without subjecting himself to a prosecution. If he had gone on to speak in part of the disposition that had been made of his property, it might have presented a different case." The cases present illustrations of witnesses testifying in part without being fully advised of their danger and right of privilege, and of the allowance of the privilege by the court after the witness was informed on the subject. The court should inform the witness of his rights when the circumstances of the case call for it, and there are instances where the privilege has been allowed after the witness had spoken, when it was evident that he had spoken in ignorance of his rights, and in such cases all the testimony, as to which a full examination could not be allowed, may be stricken out.

There is also, it appears, a distinction between the case of a witness proper and an accomplice or a party in interest. An accomplice admits his guilt and seeks to implicate others, and it is not apparent why he should claim immunity from exposure about the very matter which he is willing to confess. As to distinct collateral matters it may be different. When a party in interest volunteers to testify in his own behalf, the rule seems to be not so liberal in his favor as in the case of a disinterested witness who is summoned to testify in controversies between others. Statutes have been passed in several of the states, as was done here at the last session of the legislature, permitting defendants to testify in their own behalf, and under such statutes, when the defendant elects to testify, the question arises as to the extent he must submit to a full cross-examination. Statutes have also been enacted in several states providing that witnesses shall be required to testify in certain cases, and when they do so, that their statements shall not be used against them in any subsequent prosecution. There is a review of the decisions under such statutes in Counselman's Case. We have no statute on the subject, so far as the present case is concerned. All we know of the proceeding in which the claim of privilege was insisted on in the present case is, that petitioner was called and examined as a witness for the respondent in a quo warranto case involving the right to the office of mayor of the city of Pensacola under the recent election held for that purpose on the 4th of June last. The petitioner, after being fully advised of his rights, testified that he voted for respondent in the quo warranto case, and that his ballot was received by the inspectors. It is not questioned here, and we must assume it to be the fact, that the testimony voluntarily given by the witness was admissible and material in the case. The office of mayor of the city of Pensacola is elective, and the election held in June, 1895, was conducted under the general law governing state elections existing at the last state election. Section 2787, Rev. Stat., provides that "whoever casts knowingly an illegal vote at any election in this state held according to law, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100." The provisions of this statute are broad enough to cover illegal voting at municipal elections, and one who knowingly cast an illegal vote at the election in question would be subject to the penalties of the statute. No question is made of this in the present case, nor is it doubted that a voter at said election when called on to testify as to voting would be entitled to the privilege of silence if his testimony would tend to bring upon him the penalties of the statute. State, Hopkins, v. Olin, 23 Wis. 309. The petitioner then, was not compelled to state whether he voted at all at the election in question, if his answers would tend to criminate him, but, after being duly advised by the court, he voluntarily stated that he voted and for whom he voted. This statement, in the absence of any other showing, tended to establish the fact of a valid vote for the party for whom the ballot was cast, and it also included the principal or essential criminating charge against the voter, if he, as a matter of fact, had knowingly voted when he did not possess the requisite qualifications. Whether or not the vote was legal and entitled to be counted depended upon prescribed qualifications of the voter, and we are of the opinion that a proper application of the rule demands that the petitioner should answer the questions touching his qualifications as a voter after he had willingly stated that he had voted at the election. It is a just and reasonable requirement that a witness shall not be allowed, by an arbitrary use of his privilege, to make a partial statement of facts to the prejudice of either party to the suit. It is stated in State, Hopkins, v. Olin, supra, that a person who has voted at an election is always considered as a party when the result of the election is in controversy, and from this standpoint the rule as to subjecting interested parties to a full cross-examination would have more or less effect.

The strongest authority relied on for petitioner is the decision in Counselman's Case, but we think there is a clear distinction between that case and the present one. The matter testified about by Counselman shipping of grain over railroads was not criminal, nor did it contain any elements of criminality. The crime consisted in paying a less freight than the tariff or open rate, and when asked about this matter he refused to disclose anything about it. He stopped on the border of the criminating matter, and the case presented no ground of waiver of privilege as to such matter. The distinction is sharply drawn in the pauper case from New Hampshire. If petitioner was not a qualified person to vote at the city election, the crime of illegal voting was consummated in the act of casting his ballot, which is the principal criminating act, and having gone into this matter with full knowledge, he should state the matters tending to develop his qualifications as a voter.

Our conclusion is, that the petitioner should be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Escambia county. Order to be entered accordingly.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Weeden LOVE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PEOPLE of the State of Illinois.

(160 Ill. 501.)

1. The evidence of an accomplice is in general admissible against a prisoner on trial.

2. One jointly indicted with others may be called as a witness for the state after the entry of a nolle prosequi against him.

3. The wife of a defendant in an indictment may be called as a witness against his co-defendants, where a nolle prosequi has been entered as to him.

4. A general verdict of guilty not fixing the value of the property, under an indictment charging burglary and larceny in the same count, is a conviction of burglary, as a conviction for larceny must find the value of the property stolen.

5. Burglary is not committed by those assisting a detective in entering a building and taking money from a safe in pursuance of a previously arranged plan between him and the owner, with the sole intent of entrapping the others into the apparent commission of a crime.

6. No crime is committed where one arranges to have a crime committed against his property or himself, and knows that an attempt is to be made to encourage others to commit the act, and to lead and encourage them in its commission by one acting in concert with the owner.

7. The owner of property and his agent may wait passively for a would-be criminal to perpetrate an offense and each and every part of it for himself, but must not aid, encourage, or solicit him that they may seek to punish.

(March 28, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kankakee County to review a judgment convicting defendant of burglary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Hunter, for plaintiff in error:

At common law the prosecuting attorney had no authority to discharge the defendant and place him on the witness stand until an application had been made to the court for that purpose. Upon which a judicial inquiry was had by the court to determine whether the testimony of the proposed witness would convict the other defendants or whether the defendants, including the proposed witness, could be convicted without his testimony. Upon which the court acted judicially and until such judicial action he was not a competent witness.

Phill. Ev. 9th ed. 28; Roscoe, Crim. Ev. 7th ed. p. 127; Gray v. People, 26 Ill. 344.

The verdict, "We the jury find Weeden Love guilty and fix his penalty at one year in the penitentiary; Mulligan O'Brien not guilty," —is irregular in not finding for which offense the plaintiff was indicted for burglary and larceny.

Ruth v. People, 99 Ill. 185; Thomas v. People, 113 Ill. 531.

Before the crime of burglary can be established the people must prove beyond a reasonable doubt the dissent of Hoag to such entry, and if the prosecuting witness Hoag either directly or indirectly consented to the entry of the building in question, then no offense has been committed by plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. L. Richardson for the People.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error was convicted of burglary under an indictment charging Mulligan O'Brien, Weeden Love, William Shoof, Al. Robinson, and Aaron Perkins with burglariously breaking and entering the office building of Arthur L. Hoag on the 20th day of January, 1895. On the morning of the day on which the trial of this plaintiff in error was commenced, the state's attorney nolle pros'd as to the defendant William Shoof. On motion of Aaron Perkins, he was granted a separate trial, and the cause was continued as to him. Plaintiff in error and O'Brien were tried, and the latter found not guilty. The punishment of Love was fixed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of one year. Robinson was not arrested.

William Shoof was called as a witness for the state, and his competency as a witness was denied by the defendant. The evidence of an accomplice is in general admissible against a prisoner on trial. Gray v. People, 26 Ill. 344; Earll v. People, 73 Ill. 329; Friedberg v. People, 102 Ill. 160. The state's attorney had a right to nolle the indictment as to one of the persons indicted, and call him as a witness for the state. He is a competent witness. His credibility is to be determined by the jury. The error assigned on this question cannot be sustained, and for the same reason the error assigned for permitting the wife of William Shoof to testify is not well taken.

The indictment contained three counts, in each of which the offense of burglary is charged, and in each count the indictment then proceeds to charge that the defendants, then and there being in said office building, "did steal, take, and carry away," etc. Such an indictment charges both burglary and larceny, and these offenses may be found in the same count. 1 Hale, P. C. 556; 1 Russell, Crimes, 827; 2 Archbald, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 329–331. Where a defendant is found guilty generally, and a punishment imposed which is by law authorized to be inflicted for either offense charged in such a count, the verdict must be sustained. Crowley v. Com. 11 Met. 575; Cook v. State, 24 N. J. L. 846; Manly v. State, 7 Md. 148; Frolich v. State, 11 Ind. 213; State v. Hooker, 17 Vt. 658. The effect of this general verdict is, logically, the jury found the defendant guilty of burglary. They did not find the value of the property stolen, which would not be necessary in a conviction for burglary, but is necessary in a conviction for larceny. The verdict finding the defendant Love guilty, generally, and fixing his punishment, was therefore a conviction for burglary, and not obnoxious to the error assigned,—that it failed to specify the offense for which he was convicted. Lyons v. People, 68 Ill. 271. Had the conviction been for larceny, it would then have been necessary to find the value of the property stolen, and had the court been asked to instruct the jury that they were warranted in finding the defendant guilty of larceny if the evidence authorized it, it would doubtless have done so. Ruth v. People, 99 Ill. 185.

Without undertaking a consideration of the instructions to which exceptions are taken, we will enter into a discussion of the facts of the case, which we deem the question of paramount importance, and on which the decision must depend. In the latter part of 1894 and early part of 1895, much complaint had been made in the city of Momence of existing lawlessness. Robberies and burglaries had occurred, until complaints reached the members of the city council, whereupon a consultation of certain members was held, which resulted in the employment of a detective agency in the city of Chicago, from which a detective was sent to investigate, report, and seek to arrest the offenders. Within two weeks prior to the commission of this act, that detective, who went by the name of Robinson, visited the city of Momence. He seemed to be well supplied with money, which he used lavishly and ignobly. The uncontradicted evidence shows he made the acquaintance of this plaintiff in error, who was impecunious and with bad habits as to the use of intoxicating liquors and haunting saloons and billiard rooms. Through this acquaintance with Love, he, at his own request, was introduced to O'Brien, Perkins, and Shoof by Love. These were all young men without much money, and similar in their habits to this plaintiff in error, frequenting the same resorts. After becoming thus acquainted, this detective, by the liberal and extravagant use of money in treating to whiskey, beer, and cigars, caused these young men to follow after him, seek his association, answer his requests, and comply with his wishes. Plausible, self-contained, and strong, he was calculated to work on their weaker natures; well dressed and affable, he pleased them; and an apparent liberality with money, even giving $1 or $2 at a time to these young men on different occasions, made him an object of admiration, and he easily led and influenced them. He endeavored to excite a desire for crime, by intimating his means were thus acquired. He suggested and proposed they should engage in the commission of burglaries, robberies, etc., and sought to induce them to engage with him in such acts. Day after day and night after night his efforts were not directed to the arrest of criminals, but his mental powers and robust health, with the use of money, were directed towards an effort to make criminals of these young men. With plenty to drink and smoke and eat at his expense, he sought to undermine and dazzle their mental and moral strength, and lead them into the commission of crime. Ambitious, doubtless, to succeed in his chosen pursuit, with him the conviction of those theretofore guilty was less an object than that he might fasten on some one the commission of a crime. If he could make the criminal, and induce the commission of the crime, and cause the arrest of the actor, or throw around him a web of circumstances that would lead to conviction, it would redound to the glory of his chief, and cause his advancement. With him the end justified the means, and the reputation of the agency to which he belonged and his own advancement were apparently his object. Such means and agents are more dangerous to the welfare of society than are the crimes they were intended to detect, and the criminals they were to arrest. Robinson, having for several days been in close association with Love, proposed he should accompany him to Exline, and while there he called on Hoag, whose office was subsequently alleged to have been burglarized.

From the testimony it is apparent that Hoag knew his office was to be entered and safe opened, and he acted in concert with the detective, complied with his request in leaving money in the safe, with the expectation of the office being burglarized and safe opened, etc. He not only expected it to be done, but he made the safe ready. He marked his money for the purpose of having it taken by a burglarious entry. In brief, he left money in the safe to be stolen, with knowledge from the detective that he (the detective) had "some fellows he was trying to catch, and he might probably want to come there to catch them. . . . I expected the money to be stolen and for that reason marked it. . . . I locked the safe. . . . Thought the detective would open it in some way. . . . I left the money believing the office was to be burglarized. . . . He (the detective) asked me to leave the money there, and I told him I would." One cannot read this evidence of this witness without being impressed with the fact that he prepared his safe and office to be burglarized, and his money to be taken, and was willing and consented to its being done. With such an arrangement perfected between the occupant of the building which was to be burglarized and this detective, the latter, under the pretense of taking a train from Kankakee on a certain night, requested the plaintiff in error to take him to the latter city; and it is apparent he induced him to have Shoof, O'Brien, and Perkins accompany them, that they might have a good time. With this object in view two buggies were procured, the hire was paid by the detective, and he and Love in one, with Perkins, O'Brien, and Shoof in the other, started from Momence for Kankakee, and with each buggy there was a half pint of whiskey, furnished by Robinson. Arriving at Kankakee, the five men went to a saloon, where Robinson further evidenced his hospitable character, and there from fifteen to twenty drinks to each man were taken, between about 4 o'clock and 6 o'clock,—whiskey, beer, etc. About the latter hour the detective took the whole party to a restaurant, where he had supper furnished, for which he paid. They then again returned to the saloon, from which Robinson sent one man for sacks, another for candles, and another for oil, he in each case furnishing the money. Shoof and Love went from the saloon voluntarily, and Shoof obtained some money which was owing him, and he then purchased a revolver and some cartridges, and, at the request of Love, purchased a revolver for him, which the latter loaded. This, with reference to these transactions, is the first act shown to have been done by this defendant which was not influenced by the detective. When the party was again in the saloon, more drinks were had, which were paid for by Robinson; and about 10 o'clock the party repaired to a house of ill-fame, where three bottles of beer were paid for by Shoof. Who suggested the visit to this place is not shown by the evidence. Remaining there about an hour, they again repaired to the same saloon. In all this time, while at this saloon, Robinson frequently, in private conversations with some of these parties separately, suggested and urged the commission of burglaries and robberies. When the latter proposition was proposed to O'Brien, he refused to have anything to do with it. Robinson now, at a late hour, provided two pint bottles of whiskey, and, with one to each buggy, left Kankakee for Exline, where they left their buggies, went direct to Hoag's office, the door of which was unlocked by Robinson with one of a bunch of keys taken from his pocket, and the parties entered. O'Brien was so drunk he fell over a chair or other object while in the room. Robinson went direct to the safe, and, within five minutes, made the combination, unlocked and opened the safe, took therefrom the money which Hoag left there to be taken, and handed the same to this plaintiff in error. That money was subsequently divided by Robinson, and each of these parties had a part thereof. The safe was again locked, the office vacated and door shut, and Robinson suggested that they would need some tools for further operations, and led the way to a blacksmith shop, where he forced open a window, took therefrom some sledges, etc., and handed them to O'Brien. These were carried to their vehicles, and the party returned to Momence, where the horses and vehicles were returned to the livery stables, and about 4 o'clock in the morning, as soon as they could do so after returning their vehicles to the stables, the entire party met at Momence, in front of the bank. The uncontradicted testimony is that this meeting was with the expectation that they were to go to the train, to see Robinson off. After meeting all the party in front of the bank, Robinson stepped to the door of the bank and violently shook it, creating a noise; whereupon, from the opposite side of the street, the single policeman of the city rushed, while from the rear of the bank came the chief of the detective agency, with one of his employees and a third party, and, firing their pistols, rushed towards these indicted parties, some of whom ran. Love was seized, and the others soon arrested. The marked money taken from Hoag's safe was found on the arrested parties; tools from the blacksmith shop found, etc. The presence of the chief of the detective agency and one of his employees, with a third party, at the rear of the bank, and the location of the single policeman of the city opposite the bank at this opportune time, may have resulted from the fact that Robinson sent from Kankakee on that afternoon a telegram, but to whom is not shown.

These are the material facts in evidence. The indictment for burglarizing Hoag's office, under which this defendant was convicted, rests on this evidence. One does not escape the conviction that Robinson entered that office with Hoag's consent. If Robinson entered the building with Hoag's consent, and took the money with no intent of stealing it, but in pursuance of a previously arranged plan between him and Hoag, intending solely to entrap the defendant into the apparent commission of a crime, it is clear that no burglary was committed; there being no felonious intent on the part of Robinson in entering the building or taking the money. If no burglary was committed by Robinson, because of an absence of a felonious intent, the defendant could not have been an accomplice and privy to a burglary. Speiden v. State, 3 Tex. Strong men are sometimes unprepared to cope with temptation and resist encouragement to evil when financially embarrassed and impoverished. A contemplated crime may never be developed into a consummated act. To stimulate unlawful intentions for the purpose and with the motive of bringing them to maturity, so the consequent crime may be punished, is a dangerous practice. It is safer law and sounder morals to hold that where one arranges to have a crime committed against his property or himself, and knows that an attempt is to be made to encourage others to commit the act, by one acting in concert with such owner, that no crime is thus committed. The owner and his agent may wait passively for the would-be criminal to perpetrate the offense, and each and every part of it, for himself, but they must not aid, encourage, or solicit him that they may seek to punish. After a careful consideration of the evidence in this record, and with a deliberative regard for the importance of the question under discussion, we are constrained to hold the evidence does not sustain this conviction.

The judgment is reversed, and the defendant is ordered discharged.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Louise M. TUNNICLIFFE, by Next Friend,
v.
BAY CITIES CONSOLIDATED RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(102 Mich. 624.)

1. The mere fact that a woman injured by being dragged by a street car on which her clothing was caught testified that she should think the bolt on which the clothing caught had no part in throwing her down, aside from the jerking of the car, will not require the exclusion from the jury of the question as to negligence in the position of the bolt, since the jury from all the circumstances may decide that the bolt was, without her knowledge, the cause of the accident.

2. That an injured woman brings suit by her husband as next friend will not justify the inclusion, as an element of damages, of lost wages which belong to him.

3. The loss of the society and prospective earnings of the child is not a proper element of damages in an action by a married woman for injuries which resulted in a miscarriage.

(December 7, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Bay County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. A. E. Weadock and J. C. Weadock, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff was a minor, and in addition to this she was a married woman. Single or married her services under the proofs in this case were not her own. She was not entitled to recover for their loss.

NOTE.—Recovery of damages for miscarriage.

I. Right to damages.
II. Elements of damages.

I. Right to damages.

It has become fully established by the decisions that damages for miscarriage resulting from any wrongful or negligent injury to a pregnant woman may be included in the recovery for the injury if the miscarriage was a direct effect of such injury. Many of the cases decide this without much discussion of the elements of the damages, but apparently authorize the recovery for the miscarriage only so far as it constitutes a part of the personal injury to the mother.

In a few of the cases herein referred to, especially those as to the effects of mere fright, the question is as to the existence of any actionable wrong, but in most of them such wrong is undisputed, and the question is as to the extent of liability for its consequences. Where any actionable wrong has been done to the person liability for its consequences may include a miscarriage of which the wrong is a proximate cause, as will clearly appear in the particular cases here cited.

The mere fact of the premature birth of a child whose death resulted from injury and fright occurring to the mother does not make a case for damages, without showing that the mother's health was impaired or that she was caused any suffering by reason of such injury and premature birth. Hawkins v. Front Street Cable R. Co. 3 Wash. 592, 16 L. R. A. 808.

If a personal injury caused by a defect in a sidewalk was such as to cause the mal-position of a child and unusual pain and suffering on the part of the mother at its birth, these facts constitute elements of the damages. De Forest v. Utica, 69 N. Y. 614.

Miscarriage resulting from fright caused by a horse breaking through a defective bridge when being driven across it was held not to be too remote for recovery of damages therefor in Oliver v. La Valle, 36 Wis. 592.

The death of an unborn child, caused by personal injury to the mother in a fall from a defective bridge, was held properly proved in determining the extent of the injury to the mother, in Shartle v. Minneapolis, 17 Minn. 308.

A miscarriage caused by fright and nervous shock sustained by a woman in consequence of a train of cars running into her house was held to constitute a basis of recovery. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hunerberg, 16 Ill. App. 387.

A recovery for injuries causing a miscarriage was sustained in Bloomington v. Schrock, 17 Ill. App. 40, in which the chief question was as to evidence.

For an assault producing a miscarriage and serious personal injury and suffering, damages were recovered in Pryor v. Chadwick, 86 Hun, 75.

The mistake of a druggist in furnishing sulphate of zinc in place of Epsom salts, in consequence of which there resulted a miscarriage and subsequent death of the person to whom the medicine was administered, was held to make the druggist liable for damages. Walton v. Booth, 34 La. Ann. 913.

One who engaged in a quarrel with another man and boy within the hearing but out of the sight of a woman, who was so frightened by the disturbance as to cause a miscarriage, is held not to be liable for the injury when he did not know that she was within hearing. Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 12, 28 Am. Rep. 607.

This decision is clearly based on the theory that defendant had not done any actionable wrong although he might have been chargeable with liability if he had frightened the woman knowingly or known of her position where she might be frightened by his conduct.

Threats and demonstrations of violence by a drunken man, which so frightened a woman that she fled from her home and jumped or fell several feet from a fence in her flight, thereby causing a miscarriage, were held to create a liability for her injuries. Barbee v. Reese, 60 Miss. 906.

A landlord who made a violent assault upon some negroes on the leased premises in the presence of a woman who occupied the premises, and so frightened her as to seriously impair her health and cause a miscarriage, was held liable in an action for damages, where he knew her condition. Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 7 L. R. A. 618.

But no cause of action for a miscarriage is created when it results from the fright of a woman at seeing a person in a highway near by, who is not aware of her presence, while she is standing at a pump with the view partly intercepted by trees, shoot a dog which did not belong to her because it attacked another dog in the highway. Renner v. Canfield, 36 Minn. 90. The court held in this case that the gist of the action must be negligence in shooting in such proximity to a human residence

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is a married woman and a minor. She sues by her next friend to recover for personal injuries received while attempting to alight from a car of the defendant. Plaintiff recovered, and defendant brings error. The negligence alleged was that "while plaintiff with the consent and permission of said defendant, with due care and diligence on her part, was passing out of said car, and onto and over the rear platform of the same, for the purpose of alighting therefrom and leaving said car, and was stepping from the platform of said car to the steps thereof, said car being then and there stationary, said defendant carelessly and negligently caused said car, from which she was then departing and stepping off, to be suddenly and violently started, jerked, and moved forward by means whereof this plaintiff, while in the exercise of proper care and diligence on her part, was thrown down and against said as might naturally and reasonably be anticipated to be liable to injure the inmates by fright or otherwise, and this was not shown in this case, although the court says: "We are by no means prepared to say that, upon the evidence, a verdict for plaintiff could be sustained even upon that ground." But it held that the case was erroneously submitted to the jury.

Damages for miscarriage caused by threatening a woman with the arrest of her husband in legal proceedings, and the attachment of their store to close it up, in order to induce her to execute a security, are held to be too remote for recovery on account of such duress, where no physical violence was inflicted, attempted, or threatened. Wulstein v. Mohlman, 25 Jones & S. 50.

The fact that the wrong done in this case was not done to the person distinguishes the case from those as to personal injuries. It can be distinguished from those as to mere fright caused unintentionally, only in respect to the reasonable probability of the result as one that should have been contemplated.

Miscarriage from a nervous shock caused by the fall of a bundle of laths which did not strike the person is too remote to sustain a recovery of damages for negligence in respect to the fall. Rock v. Denis, Mont. L. Rep. 4 Super. Ct. 356.

Injury to a pregnant woman from fright caused by a runaway horse which did not touch her will not sustain an action. Lehman v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 47 Hun, 355.

In case of an indecent assault by a porter in a sleeping car upon a passenger, it is held that if a miscarriage results therefrom the suffering and injurious effects, temporary or permanent, thereby caused to the person, health, or strength of the woman were to be included in the damages. Campbell v. Pullman Pallace-Car Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 484.

If the misconduct of an employee of a sleeping-car company in ejecting a woman from a berth to which she had a right resulted in a miscarriage as a proximate result, the carrier is liable for the damages thus caused, even if her condition was not known to the carrier or its employees. Mann Boudoir Car Co. v. Dupre, 54 Fed. Rep. 646, 21 L. R. A. 289, 13 U. S. App. 183.

A miscarriage caused by a personal injury to a passenger, and great pain suffered in consequence thereof, may be inquired into and are not consequences too remote to authorize a recovery. Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Randall, 79 Ga. 304.

The upsetting of a stage coach by reason of the driver's drunkenness, causing injury to a passenger and the premature birth of a child, were held to make the carrier liable for such injury, although no injury might have resulted to persons in a different condition. Sawyer v. Dulany, 30 Tex. 479.

Damages for the wrongful ejection of a passenger from a train are held to include injury to the feelings and physical pain, suffering, and anguish caused by a miscarriage which resulted from the injury. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Casey, 52 Tex. 112.

A miscarriage and sickness brought on by exertion when a woman was carelessly directed to leave a train several miles from the depot on a cloudy night when she supposed she had reached her destination were held to make the carrier liable for the damages. Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 41.

Damages resulting from a miscarriage caused by negligence of a street-car company were recovered in Reading City Pass. R. Co. v. Eckert (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 791, and the court charged that it was not necessarily contributory negligence for the plaintiff to ride on the street car.

Fright causing nervous convulsions and illness, including a miscarriage, which is occasioned by imminent danger of a collision of street cars and the confusion of ringing alarm bells and the rushing out of passengers, was held, in Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, to render the carrier liable for the damages. The court says: "It may be that, where a passenger, without the knowledge of the carrier, is sick, feeble, or disabled, the latter does not owe to him a higher degree of care than he owes to passengers generally, and that the carrier would not be liable to him for an injury caused by an act or omission not negligent as to an ordinary passenger. But when the act or omission is negligence as to any and all passengers, well or ill, any one injured by the negligence must be entitled to recover to the full extent of the injury so caused, without regard to whether, owing to his previous condition of health, he is more or less liable to injury."

A collision of street cars caused by the breaking of the chain of a car brake on down grade in which the glass of the car was broken, the dashboard smashed, passengers thrown out, and one of them so injured that she suffered a miscarriage was car, and down and upon the platform thereof, and down and upon and against the steps of said car, and her dress skirt or skirts caught on said bolt, so negligently put, placed, and permitted to be and remain in said platform by said defendant as aforesaid, and she was held fast to and against said car, and to and against the platform of said car, and to and against the steps thereof, and partially upon the ground, and was so held, dragged, and carried along by the motion of said car," etc. The declaration had previously alleged that defendant had "carelessly and negligently placed, and permitted to be and remain, an iron bolt, extending and projecting above the real platform, to wit, 5 inches."

1. In the course of the charge to the jury, the circuit judge asked for suggestions from counsel. Defendant's counsel thereupon asked the court to charge that the plaintiff could not recover under any circumstances by reason of the location of the bolt or pedal, and called attention to a portion of the charge of the court as follows: "I do not understand that it is seriously contended by the defendant if the accident happened because of this bolt remaining in an improper place during the journey, to endanger women getting off the car, but what the company is liable,"—and asked that it be modified. The plaintiff's testimony was to the effect that she was in the act of stepping off the car when it started, and that she was thrown backward, and her clothing caught. She further testified: "I took it for granted that my clothes were caught; I didn't know in what. I could not see, but in my struggle I threw my arm behind me, and as I did so, my hand came down on something that projected from the platform, and I pulled my skirt, and a bolt came out from the platform." On cross-examination she testified: "I should think the bolt had no part in throwing me down, aside from the jerking of the car." It is claimed by the defendant that there was no room under this testimony for the jury to find that plaintiff's clothing was caught before she was thrown backward. But we think this construction of the testimony is too narrow. It would appear from the charge of the court that defendant had contended before the jury that plaintiff's story was unreasonable and that the injury could not have occurred in the man-held to give her a right of action for the damages resulting therefrom. Wynn v. Central Park, N. & E. R. R. Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 181.

For injury to a passenger on a street car resulting from a collision with a railroad train the damages were held to include a miscarriage as well as injury to the spine and permanent impairment of the nervous system. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pendery (Tex.) 27 S. W. 213.

A declaration alleging fright and alarm of a passenger caused by a collision whereby she became sick, etc., and suffered great pain and anguish, and that by reason of such terror and alarm caused by the collision and of sickness caused thereby she bore a still-born child, was held good on general demurrer in Fitzpatrick v. Great Western R. Co. 12 U. C. Q. B. 645.

II. Elements of damages.

The cases are not numerous in which an attempt has been made to include in the recovery for miscarriage any compensation for the loss of prospective offspring. In the few cases in which such a claim has been made it has been rejected by the courts in harmony with the doctrine of the above case of TUNNCLIFFE v. BAY CITIES CONSOL. R. CO.

Thus, it was directly decided in a recent New York case that the loss of prospective offspring by miscarriage cannot be considered as an element for the recovery in an action by a husband for the loss of his wife's services and the expense resulting from a personal injury to her. Butler v. Manhattan R. Co. 143 N. Y. 417, 26 L. R. A. 46. The court in this case, after adverting to the difficulty of finding any safe basis upon which to estimate the pecuniary damages caused by the death of a child, says that in cases like this "there are no elements whatever upon which a jury could base any conclusion that a pecuniary injury had been suffered by the plaintiff from the loss of the unborn child, and this inquiry should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury as too remote and speculative to form an element in the recovery." It adds further: "It is not in the interest of justice to extend the field of speculation in jury trials beyond its present limits"—and declares that to sustain the ruling which allowed damage for the loss of offspring "would go beyond what has been hitherto sanctioned by the courts."

The other cases following are to similar effect.

Any physical or mental suffering attending a miscarriage caused by accident is a part of the injury for which damages are recoverable, but any injured feelings following the miscarriage, and not a part of the pain naturally attending it, are too remote. Bovee v. Danville, 53 Vt. 183.

The death of a child before birth and the grief and sorrow of its parents thereby occasioned cannot be elements of damages for injury to the mother caused by delay in delivering a telegram by which a physician is summoned, but the damages are limited to the injury to the mother alone, although both mental and physical suffering on account of her own condition may be considered. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, 1 L. R. A. 728.

Maternal anguish is not allowed as an element of recovery for the loss of a child at birth by mere want of skill or proper care on the part of an attending physician, where there is nothing to indicate that he did not have the proper sympathy and regard for the patient's welfare. Smith v. Overby, 30 Ga. 241.

The refusal of a charge to the jury against allowing damages for disappointed maternal hopes and anticipations was held to constitute no error in Powell v. Augusta & S. R. Co. 77 Ga. 192, but this was on the ground that the jury had been properly instructed already by calling their attention to the matters they were to consider in assessing damages without including such hopes and anticipations.

So, in reviewing instructions to the effect that pain and suffering or sorrow resulting from a miscarriage constituted elements of damages, the court held that the word "sorrow" should be omitted because sorrow was too remote to be considered, unless it was that sorrow which accompanies the actual injury and if suffered at the time of the miscarriage. Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297.

The review of the decisions shows that they are in almost entire harmony in holding that miscarriage may be one of the effects of wrong for which recovery may be had. They also show that the effect on the mother alone is to be considered, and recovery for miscarriage allowed only so far as it is part of her personal injuries, not including any recompense for loss of anticipated offspring.

ner supposed by plaintiff. The jury had a right to construe the facts, and if in their judgment it was more reasonable to suppose that her clothing had been caught upon the bolt without her knowledge before the car started and threw her to the ground, we cannot say that the circumstances of the case did not furnish a justification for that inference.

2. On the trial the plaintiff was permitted, against the defendant's objection, to testify that before the injury she had painted for profit, and was able to earn $5 to $10 and $15 per week, and that by the injury she was rendered unable to do this kind of work. The court charged the jury upon the subject of damages as follows: "She is entitled to recover, in case you so determine from the evidence,—she is entitled, first, to the value of her time. Whatever it was worth, a month or week, you will give it her, if you come to that conclusion, as I said before." It was error to admit this testimony, and permit the recovery for the impairment of the plaintiff's ability to earn money. The husband is, prima facie, entitled to the earnings of the wife. Hicks v. McLachlan, 94 Mich. 282. But it is contended in the present case that, as the husband was a party to the proceedings as next friend to the plaintiff, he would be estopped by the verdict from bringing suit hereafter to recover these damages, and hence that no injury could have been done defendant; and Baker v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 91 Mich. 298, is cited as sustaining this contention. The case cited fully recognizes that the objection as made in a suit prosecuted by the next friend is good; but it was held in that case that inasmuch as such testimony was admitted, and as plaintiff actually received payment upon the judgment in his capacity as next friend, he ought not to be permitted to recover it again in his individual capacity. In the present case, the defendant, upon making the objection, had no reason to apprehend that the plaintiff expected to claim a recovery for any damages not within the issue, and particularly was this true under the circumstances of this case, as it appears conclusively that the defendant could not have understood that it was necessary to offer any proof to meet the plaintiff's testimony; for, after the plaintiff's testimony, above quoted, had been given, a question was put to another witness on the same line, which was objected to, and the court said: "I think the husband is entitled to the wages. I guess there is no use going into that in this case at all." After this certainly the defendant's counsel could not be expected to meet such proofs as had crept in on this subject; and the subsequent charge above quoted was not only erroneous, as matter of law, but given, as it was, after the previous intimation which cut off proofs, on the part of the defendant, was based upon a necessarily ex parte showing.

3. The testimony tended to show that one of the results of the injury to plaintiff was a miscarriage. The court charged the jury as follows: "As to this child, if the plaintiff lost a child by reason of the liability of the defendant in this case, you may give damage for it. The society, enjoyment, and prospective services of the child is a recognized element in that regard, and you may give what it is reasonably worth." This charge was clearly erroneous. There was, of course, no proof in the case as to the prospective earnings of the child, even if the mother would be the proper person to recover for such loss. Nor would the loss of the child's society be a proper element of damages. While the jury is allowed to consider the case with all its facts, and to take into account, for the purpose of compensation, not only the physical pain, but also mental suffering, in determining the award of damages, and while, of necessity, this involves to some extent a consideration of the nature of the injury, and cannot exclude from the consideration of the jury the fact that the physical and mental suffering of the mother by reason of such an injury would be more intense than in the case of the ordinary fracture of a limb, yet beyond this it would not be competent for the jury to go, and to attempt to compensate for the sorrow and grieving of the mother. As was said in Bovee v. Danville, 53 Vt. 183, "If the violence done her person results in the miscarriage, the miscarriage was a legitimate result of such negligence. Any physical or mental suffering attending the miscarriage is a part of it, and a proper subject for compensation. But the rule goes no further. Any injured feelings following the miscarriage, not part of the pain naturally attending it, are too remote to be considered an element of damage. If the plaintiff lamented the loss of her offspring, such grief involves too much an element of sentiment to be left to the conjecture and caprice of a jury. If, like Rachel, she wept for her children, and would not be comforted, a question of continuing damage is presented, too delicate to be weighed by any scales which the law has yet invented." The only case which we have found which is in seeming conflict with this is that of Smith v. Overby, 30 Ga. 241; but the supreme court of that state, in the later case of Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, in treating of a charge which permitted of a recovery for the pain, suffering, or sorrow resulting from miscarriage, said: "We would suggest that the word 'sorrow' be omitted from the charge of the court on the next trial. It is most too remote to be considered an element of damage, unless it is that sorrow which accompanies the actual injury, and is suffered at the time of the miscarriage. The loss of the child by a miscarriage would affect women so differently that it would be hard for men, sitting as jurors, to estimate it as an element of damage; and we therefore think that it would be better to omit, in the future, any instruction to the jury upon the question of sorrow as an element of damage. Pain and suffering give a wide latitude to juries, and there are very few complaints made of the smallness of the amounts found by juries upon these two elements of damage,"—citing the case of Bovee v. Danville, above cited. See also 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 42.

Numerous other questions are discussed in the briefs of counsel, but we think it unnecessary to consider them at length. Those relating to the expressions of pain and complaints of present suffering are within the previous rulings of this court. See Girard v. Kalamazoo, 92 Mich. 610; Lacas v. Detroit City R. Co. Id. 412, and cases cited. None of the other questions are likely to arise on a new trial.

For the errors pointed out, judgment will be reversed with costs, and a new trial ordered.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

CONSUMERS' GAS TRUST COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
Frances PERREGO

(.....Ind.....)

1. Ample notice of a leak in a high-pressure main of natural gas is given to the owner of the main by a continuance of the leak for several years, and also direct information given to line walkers.
2. The destruction of a building by the explosion of natural gas which escaped from a leak in a high-pressure main 80 or 90 feet distant across a street, and reached the building by penetrating the soil under its frozen surface, renders the gas company liable, where it had made no effort to prevent the leak, although this had continued for several years and notice of the fact had been given to line walkers.

Messrs. Carson & Thompson for appellee.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was by appellee against appellant and others to recover for injuries received from an explosion of natural gas. It is alleged in the complaint that on the day of the accident, February 14, 1893, and for a long time prior thereto, the appellee was lawfully an occupant of the dwelling house at the southeast cornor of Illinois and Twenty-Sixth streets, in the city of Indianapolis; that during the whole period of such occupancy the appellant was engaged in drilling and mining for natural gas, and conveying the same to said city by means of high and low pressure mains, service pipes, and regulators laid along and in said Illinois street, immediately in front of and adjacent to said dwelling house so occupied by appellee; that said natural gas so conducted along and through said mains, pipes, and regulators subjected the same to a great strain and pressure, to wit, often of 150 pounds to the square inch; that the said gas is of highly dangerous, penetrating, elusive, and explosive nature, and requires great care, caution, and perfectly tight mains, pipes, and regulators, in order to secure safety in its management and control, all of which was well known to the appellant; that the appellant so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully constructed and maintained its said mains, pipes, and regulators that they leaked, and permitted said gas to escape from control, in large quantities, for many weeks, in the immediate vicinity of appellee's said dwelling; that such escaping gas percolated and penetrated through the loose sand and gravel until it reached and accumulated in large quantities within the foundation and under said dwelling house, all without the knowledge or fault of appellee; and that the same became ignited without any fault or negligence of appellee, thereby causing a violent explosion within and under said dwelling, completely demolishing the same, destroying the personal property of appellee, and causing her great physical and mental pain and injury. To this complaint a general denial was filed, and the cause was submitted to a jury for trial. On a verdict for appellee, judgment was entered in her favor for $6,000, and this appeal followed. The only error assigned is that the court overruled the motion for a new trial.

The ground was frozen over solid at the time of the explosion, and the leak from which the gas escaped into the earth was in the large main, at a point where the main was covered by a sleeve. It appears that in the fall and winter of 1887 the Broad Ripple Natural Gas Company laid its high-pressure main line from the city of Indianapolis northward, along the west side of Illinois street, to the wells from which the gas was obtained. The pipe was an 8-inch, screw-joint, wrought-iron pipe. In constructing the line the company had a force of men laying pipe from the city north, and another force laying pipe from the field to the city, and those two forces met a little south of the house under which the explosion afterwards took place. At the point of intersection the pipes could not be screwed together, but the ends were brought up close, and connected by a sleeve. When the two ends were brought together the sleeve was fitted over them, and calked with lead. The appellant purchased the Broad Ripple line in July, 1889; and the main question for decision is whether appellant was careless and negligent in the purchase, inspection, and maintenance of the line during the three years and a half from said purchase until the accident, in February, 1893. The evidence submitted to the jury on this question is exceedingly voluminous. It appears that there was no connection by pipe between appellant's main and appellee's house. The latter was supplied with gas by the Indianapolis Natural Gas Company, which company had its gas main also in Illinois street, and close to appellant's line. The location of the sleeve on appellant's pipe, where the gas leaked, was across the street, and about 90 feet distant from appellee's dwelling. The sleeve was smooth on the inside, as was the pipe on the outside. The inner diameter of the sleeve was an inch and a half greater than the outer diameter of the pipe over which it fitted. This open space was filled in with lead. There was evidence that there had been a leak at this point, and that the gas escaped through the earth from the first laying of the pipe, six years before the explosion. It is the theory of the appellee that during all these years the gas permeated the surrounding earth; that it escaped more readily from the surface during the summer, but that, when the ground was frozen over, the gas was forced to greater distances under the hardened crust. At the time of the purchase of the line by the appellant a test of the line was made, by turning on full gas pressure, being nearly or quite 300 pounds to the square inch. It is argued that there being a leak, even at that time, under the sleeve, the great pressure thus turned on still further opened or displaced the lead between the pipe and the sleeve, and, consequently, that the escape of gas was greater after that test.

Counsel for appellant, in arguing that there was no negligence in the purchase, care, and maintenance of the pipe line contend (1) that appellant employed, as superintendent of its pipe lines and gas wells, a man of large experience in such work; (2) that before the purchase from the Broad Ripple Company the line was carefully tested, and found in good condition; (3) that appellant did not know, and had no means of knowing, without digging up its entire line, of the existence of the sleeve in question; (4) that after the inspection and purchase of the line the appellant, by its line walkers and other employees, kept up a careful supervision and inspection of its pipe lines, including that on Illinois street, almost every day, up to the time of the explosion; (5) that the line was properly laid, and the sleeve and joint were properly and skilfully constructed; and (6) that the "appellant did not know of the existence of this sleeve, or of a leak at that point, until after the explosion. Its employees, Watson, the foreman of field work, laying pipe, making repairs, etc., and the line walkers, Reichardt and Harrison, who walked over the line every few days, had never discovered any evidences of a leak at that point, though it was their special business to look for leaks." The first, second, third, and fifth of these contentions have reference chiefly to care exercised in testing and discovering the condition of the line at the time of its purchase from the Broad Ripple Company, while the fourth and sixth contentions relate chiefly to care exercised by the appellant in the inspection and repair of the pipe line after its purchase. On appeal, all presumptions are in favor of the judgment; and, if there is sufficient competent evidence to sustain it, the verdict will not be overthrown by reason of any conflict in such evidence. Mr. Shackleton, general superintendent of the appellant company, and who had full charge of the lines and wells, gave, as the only test or examination of the condition of the line made at the time of the purchase from the Broad Ripple Company, that a full pressure, or about 300 pounds, was turned on at the wells; and he said that the line "stood the pressure all right apparently," and that he did not know of any leaks thereby disclosed. He also knew, he said, that the main pipe was 8 inches in diameter, and he said that he did not learn of the existence of the leak until a few days after the accident. At the time of the purchase he did not, as he testified, make any inquiry as to the location of sleeves on the line. They received from the Broad Ripple Company a surveyed chart of the line, but he did not examine it particularly. The chart does not seem to have been produced on the trial, although in possession of the appellant company. Mr. Shackleton had never looked on the chart for sleeves, but said he knew from what he saw that they were not indicated on the chart. He did not make inquiry of any one for sleeves, and did not find out whether there were any on the line or not. In the city they do ordinarily keep memoranda of all sleeves, so that, if there is a break or a leak, they can examine the memoranda and determine where it is located. They had never examined the place where the leak was at the sleeve in question. No repairs had ever been made by the company at that point from the time of the purchase until after the explosion. Mr. Watson, general foreman of the company, and assistant of the superintendent, in charge of all repairs, testified that after the explosion he had the earth dug up at the sleeve, and found a leak on the underside of the sleeve, between the sleeve and the pipe, where the lead seemed to have been "drawn out." He had the leak calked by hammering the lead all back in tight, with calking tools. It has not since leaked. He found the earth all around blackened with the gas, and thought it would take some time to discolor the earth in that way. Mr. Lyman, the secretary, testified that there is but little gas turned on the main line in summer, and that there is no regular inspection during that time. Mr. Everett, who lives in the neighborhood, and who was a witness for the appellant, had smelled gas on the street for a long time, but he thought it came from a regulator below Twenty-Sixth street, or from one above that street. Mr. Reichardt, a line walker of the company, whose business, among other things, was to examine the line for leaks, and to calk them when found, testified that soon after he went on the line, a few months before the explosion, he smelled gas a few feet north of Twenty-Sixth street, but he thought it came from a regulator about 200 feet further north. Mr. Harrison, another line walker, was at one time told by a Mr. Watson, riding by in a buggy, that he smelled gas near Twenty-Sixth street; but Mr. Harrison testified that he could not discover any leak, and did not report the matter to the office. At other times he smelled gas himself, but thought it came from a regulator. This was about two years before the explosion. Mr. Page, a witness for the appellant, and who lived on Illinois street, near Twenty-Fifth street, had frequently smelled gas near the locality of the sleeve, but, until the explosion, had no knowledge as to where it came from. Appellant's evidence shows only irregular inspection of the line, except in cold weather, at which time, it is admitted, it would be difficult to detect leaks in the main line, for the reason that the gas could not penetrate to the surface through the frozen ground.

Appellee produced a multitude of witnesses,—among them, one of the contractors and other persons who had aided in digging and covering up the trench when the Broad Ripple line was first laid; also, plumbers, gas fitters, and others who had occasion to pass along the sidewalk where the sleeve was placed; also, very many neighbors and other persons residing on the street in the immediate vicinity. These witnesses, without an exception, testified that there had been a gas leak at the sleeve almost from the time the main was first put down, six years prior to the explosion. It was matter of common talk in the neighborhood. The odor was sometimes so strong that passers-by crossed the street to avoid it. One witness, in going along the sidewalk in the evening with a lantern, turned out the light at that point, for fear of setting fire to the escaping gas. Several of the witnesses had at different times seen the gas on fire as it came up through the earth, as if kerosene oil had been poured out and was burning upon the ground. After rains, and when water stood in the gutter, the gas was often seen to bubble up through the water. In at least two instances, appellant's agents, the line walkers, Reichardt and Harrison, were notified of the escaping gas at the sleeve, and asked to repair the leak. No repairs, however, were ever made at that point until after the explosion. To say nothing of the notice directly given to appellant's line walkers, it would seem that the continuous leak of gas at this sleeve for the whole period of six years, and particularly during the three years and a half from appellant's purchase to the date of the accident, was ample notice to the company of the existence of this dangerous defect in its high-pressure main.

The appellee testified as to the particulars of the accident; that it occurred in the evening. She had lit the lamp. There was no one else in the house at the time. She had need to go to the cellar to take down a crock of milk. She opened the cellar door, and set the lamp on a bench near by, to show light down the cellar way. As she went down, she thought the light grew dimmer; and as she returned, when halfway up the stairs, she looked up at the lamp standing on the bench, and saw that the light had grown small, and burned blue. Immediately after, and before she reached the top of the stairway she saw the lamp blaze up. She remembered no more until she found herself fastened in the ruins of the house, which had blown up and was already on fire. Her neighbors extricated her from the wreckage. She had not smelled the gas, having been deprived of the sense of smell for many years. She had no thought of there being any gas in the cellar. As the house was supplied with gas by the Indianapolis Company, it was thought at first that the explosion had been caused by an escape from that company's pipes. Accordingly, the Indianapolis Company spent some time uncovering its service pipe from the house across the street, and also its main pipe for some distance, but found no leak. It was sixteen days after the explosion that the appellant company began to uncover its main, to discover whether there was a leak there; and, on uncovering the pipe at the sleeve, the gas rushed out from the leak with great force. During the whole period, of sixteen days, from the explosion to the uncovering of the sleeve, the escaping gas continued to burn in jets from two to eight inches high, all around the inside of the north, south, and west foundation walls of appellee's house. The gas came out between the brick, and from the ground along the bottom of the walls. Within two minutes after the uncovering of the sleeve, as the evidence shows, the jets of gas in the foundations of the house ceased to burn, and no gas could be discovered there afterwards. The earth around the sleeve was found blackened with gas. The ground was frozen above the pipe, and the pipe itself lay in loose gravel and sand. There can be no doubt, as the jury found, that the gas passed from the leak in the sleeve, through the loose soil, until it reached the foundations of appellee's house, 80 or 90 feet distant, across the street.

Counsel for appellant say that appellee was negligent in not notifying the company of the leak. The leak was across the street from appellee. She did not receive her gas from the appellant. It is hard, therefore, to understand how she should have thought that the leak at appellant's sleeve, 90 feet distant, —even if she knew of its existence, which does not appear from the evidence,—could have been the source of any danger to her.

Other matters are discussed by counsel, including the instructions of the court, but we are unable to discover any substantial error for the reversal of the judgment. The rulings of the court throughout the trial, and the instructions, were quite as favorable as appellant could ask; and, in view of the almost uncontradicted evidence, we are unable to see how the jury could have reached a different conclusion.

Judgment affirmed.

August OLESON, Appt.,
v.
LAKE SHORE & MICHIGAN SOUTHERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

(143 Ind. 405.)

1. A verdict is properly directed for defendant in an action for personal injuries, where the plaintiff fails to prove affirmatively that his fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury, even though he has established all the other facts of his cause of action.

2. One who, in approaching a railroad track, has an unobstructed view of an approaching train, is not relieved from contributory negligence in attempting to cross the track by the fact that his view becomes obstructed by the smoke from a train going in an opposite direction.

3. One who attempts to cross a railroad track immediately after the passage of a train whose smoke obscures the view, in the opposite direction, but is rapidly being carried away by the wind, is guilty of contributory negligence in not waiting until the view becomes clear.

(January 23, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Porter County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Peterson, for appellant:

The question of whether or not the appellant was guilty of contributory negligence was a mixed question of fact and of law that should have been submitted to the jury for its decision.

Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Grames, 136 Ind. 39; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 800; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn, 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am. Rep. 134; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. Appellant did all things that the rule of law required him to do.

Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Spilker, 134 Ind. 383; Cadwallader v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 128 Ind. 518; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Cox, 8 Ind. App. 29; *Chicago, & E. I. R. Before contributory negligence can be adjudged against the appellant in this case by the court, it must appear that the danger incurred by him was known and immediate, and that a prudent man would not, under the circumstances, have assumed the risk, and that the evidence tends but to that conclusion alone.

Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Ott, supra.

Messrs. Baker & Miller, George C. Greene, and O. G. Getzen for appellee.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by appellant to recover damages for an injury received while attempting to cross appellee's railroad track a a grade crossing. There was a general denia to the complaint, and trial by jury. After appellant had introduced all his evidence, and rested his case, the jury, by direction of the court, on motion of appellee, returned a verdict for appellee. The court thereupon, over a motion for a new trial, rendered judgment against appellant. The only question presented is, Did the court err in instructing the jury to find for appellee? This instruction was given on the ground stated therein,—that the appellant had not shown that he was free from contributory negligence. Appellant contends that the evidence was such that the question of whether or not appellant was guilty of contributory negligence should have been submitted to the jury. The determination of the question presented requires an examination of the evidence. The only evidence given was the testimony of plaintiff, and upon his statements the case must be determined.

It appears from the evidence: That at Miller's Station, where the injury occurred, the railroad tracks of appellee run east and west. That at the time of the injury, and for several years prior thereto, there were two main tracks. The north track was used by trains going east, and the south track by trains going west. There was a highway running north and south, which crossed these tracks. That running east from this highway was another highway, immediately south, and adjoining the right of way of appellee. That the right of way of appellee is 100 feet wide. That appellant had lived a number of years within 150 feet of this highway crossing, had crossed it often, and was thoroughly familiar with the method of running trains upon these two main tracks. He knew that the north track was for east-bound trains, and the south track was for west-bound trains, and that freight and passenger trains passed each other frequently at this point. Immediately before the accident, appellant was going west upon the east and west highway, south of the tracks, driving one horse, attached to a light wagon, upon which there were three or four dump boards, upon which he was sitting sideways, between the wheels of the wagon, with his face to the south and his back to the tracks. As he turned north, in the highway running north and south, he faced to the north, and looked both ways, east and west, and saw a freight train coming from the west, going east on the north track. He stopped about 40 feet from the south track to wait for this east-bound train to pass. When he stopped he looked to the east, and saw nothing. When he stopped the east-bound train, on the north track, was west of the depot, and about 400 feet west of the crossing. The day was somewhat dark and overcast, atmosphere heavy, and the clouds obscured the sun, and appellant could not see over ½ mile, to distinguish objects. The wind was blowing from the northeast to the southwest. The east-bound train, on the north track, was going at about the rate of 15 miles per hour, and was blowing out large volumes of dense, black smoke, which fell to the ground on the south side of the train, or between the train and appellant, as it passed the highway crossing and proceeded east, and continued to throw out smoke as it proceeded east until after the accident; and the dense, black smoke obscured the view on the south track east of the crossing. There were about thirty cars on the east bound train, and the train was about 900 feet in length After the caboose at the rear of the east-bound train had passed the crossing about two or three rail lengths, appellant, who had remained sitting upon his wagon when it had stopped, started his horse, and drove upon the crossing. Just before he started his horse he looked to the east and west and listened, but he could not see to the east, along the south track, but a short distance, on account of the smoke which had been thrown from the engine drawing the east bound train. At the time appellant started his horse, the wind was clearing away the smoke, and to the west of the crossing it had almost disappeared, and appellant could see to the east about 100 feet. As his horse stepped upon the track, appellant, who was, and had been from the time he started, looking east for a train, saw an engine and train of cars about 100 feet away, approaching him from the east, on the south track, at the rate of 10 or 15 miles per hour. He whipped his horse with the lines, and endeavored to pass in front of the engine, but the rear wheel of the wagon was struck by the train, and appellant injured. Appellee's servants on the train which struck appellant did not sound the whistle or ring the bell while approaching said crossing. From the point where appellant stopped, about 40 feet south of the south track, he could see, except for the smoke, a distance of at least ½ mile eastward along the south main track; and there was no smoke to obscure this view to the east, along the south main track, until the engine in front of the east-bound train, on the north main track, passed upon said crossing. There were no intervening objects or obstructions, except a wire fence and telegraph poles.

It is thoroughly settled that if the facts are undisputed, and only one inference can reasonably be drawn from them, the question whether there is or is not contributory negligence is one of law for the court. Korrady v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 131 Ind. 262; Rogers v. Leyden, 127 Ind. 50, and cases cited; Vermillion County Comrs. v. Chipps, 131 Ind. 56, 16 L. R. A. 228. But if the facts are disputed, or whenever there may reasonably be a difference of opinion as to the inferences and conclusions from the facts, it is a question for the jury. Rogers v. Leyden, supra. We think it is also correct doctrine that where the evidence given at the trial, with all the inferences which the jury may justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such verdict, if returned should be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant. Weis v. Madison, 75 Ind. 254, 39 Am. Rep. 135, and cases cited; Faris v. Hoberg, 134 Ind. 269, 272-274; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dunn, 138 Ind. 18, 27; Sharpe v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Asso. 139 Ind. 92, 95; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 542; Schofield v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 114 U. S. 615, 29 L. ed. 224; Continental Imp. Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. ed. 403; Baylis v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 113 U. S. 316, 28 L. ed. 989; Schuylkill & D Imp. Co. v. Munson, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 442, 20 L. ed. 867; Thomp. Trials, §§ 2249, 2250, 2262; Elliott, Gen. Prac. §§ 876, 889; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, § 3, pp. 243-246. The rule is thus stated by Judge Elliott in his General Practice (§ 889): "The test for determining when a case should be taken from the jury is substantially the same as upon a motion for a nonsuit; and where a verdict, if against the party seeking to have the case taken from the jury, would have to be set aside as contrary to the law and the evidence, a verdict in his favor should be directed, upon proper application. . . . The doctrine once prevailed in many jurisdictions that wherever there is any evidence, however slight, tending to support a material issue, the case must go to the jury; and this rule is still applied in some states, but the modern decisions have established a more reasonable rule, to wit, that, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is or may be in every case a preliminary question for the judge, —not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the burden of proof is imposed; of course if there is no evidence whatever upon a material and necessary point a verdict should be directed upon proper application, against the party having the burden of proof, and as we have seen, this is the better rule also, where the evidence, with all legitimate inferences, will not support a verdict." It is settled law in this state that, when a person crossing a railroad is injured by a collision with a train, the fault is prima facie his own, and he must affirmatively show that his fault or negligence did not contribute to the injury, before he is entitled to recover for such injury. Smith v. Wabash R. Co. 141 Ind. 92, and cases cited; Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Duncan (Ind.) 42 N. E. 37, and cases cited. It is essential to appellant's right to recover that he aver and prove that he was free from negligence proximately causing his injury. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Duncan (Ind.) 42 N. E. 37, and cases cited; Smith v. Wabash R. Co. 141 Ind. 92, and cases cited; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 284, 8 L. R. A. 593; Mann v. Belt Railroad & S. Y. Co. 128 Ind. 138, and cases cited; Pennsylvania Co. v. Meyers, 136 Ind. 242, and cases cited. If he failed to prove this essential and indispensable element of his cause of action, it was the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to find against him, even though he established all the other essential facts of his cause of action. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Duncan, supra, and cases cited; Chase v. Maine C. R. Co. 77 Me. 62, 52 Am. Rep. 744.

It is settled law in this jurisdiction that, when one approaches a point where a highway crosses a railroad track on the same level, the railroad track is itself a warning of danger and it is his duty to proceed with caution, and if he attempts to cross the track, either on foot or in a vehicle of any kind, he must exercise ordinary care under all the circumstances. He must assume that there is danger, and act with ordinary care and prudence upon that assumption. The law defines precisely what the term, "ordinary care under all the circumstances," means in these cases. The question of care at railway crossings, as affecting the traveler, is no longer, as a rule, a question for the jury. The quantum of care is exactly prescribed, as a matter of law. In attempting to cross, the traveler must listen for signals, notice signs put up as warnings, and listen for approaching trains. In proportion as the danger increases must the vigilance of the person attempting to cross increase. He is rigidly required to do all that care and prudence would suggest to avoid injury. And when, from physical infirmities, darkness, snow, fog, smoke, steam, the inclemency of the weather, noise of any kind, buildings, or other obstructions and hindrances, it is more difficult to see or hear, greater precautions must be taken to avoid injury than would otherwise be necessary, and under such circumstances there can be no excuse for a failure to use such reasonable precautions as would probably have prevented injury. If the traveler, by looking, could have seen an approaching train, or, by listening, could have heard it, in time to have avoided injury, it will be presumed, if he is injured by collision, that he did not look and listen, or, if he did look and listen, he did not heed what he saw or heard. Such conduct is negligence per se. Mental absorption or reverie, from business, grief, or other cause, will not excuse the omission of duty to look and listen. From the numerous cases sustaining the foregoing propositions, we cite the following. Smith v. Wabash R. Co. supra, and cases cited; Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Duncan, supra, and cases cited; Cadwallader v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 128 Ind. 518; Mann v. Belt Railroad & S. Y. Co. Id. 142; *Indiana, B. & W. R. There is no exception to the rule stated as to a traveler's duty at a crossing, except where the traveler, by some act of the company, has been misled and thrown off his guard, and thus prevented from taking the proper precautions. Smith v. Wabash R. Co. supra; North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Heileman, supra, and on page 62; Cadwallader v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. supra; Korrady v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 131 Ind. 261, 264, 265; Cincinnati, I. St L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, supra. The failure of the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell does not relieve the person approaching a crossing from the necessity of taking ordinary precaution for his safety. Negligence of the employees of a railroad company is no excuse for negligence on the part of the person injured. Korrady v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 131 Ind. 261, 264, and cases cited; Thornton v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 131 Ind. 492, 497, 498, and cases cited; Smith v. *Wabash R. Law, p. 73 (note 1), 74 (note 3); Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 185.

It is clear from appellant's testimony that when he came to a stop, 40 feet south of the south main track, the east-bound train was about opposite the depot, which was 250 feet west of the crossing. This train was about 900 feet long, and going east, on the north main track, at about the rate of 15 miles per hour. When the caboose of the east-bound train had passed two or three rail lengths east of the crossing, appellant saw the engine of the west-bound train 100 feet east of the crossing. This train was going at about the rate of 14 or 15 miles per hour,—about the same rate per hour as the east-bound train. It is clear that from the time the east-bound train was 250 feet west of the crossing until it reached the crossing the west-bound train on the south main track was within ¼ mile of the crossing, and in plain view thereof. During all this time, and until the engine drawing the east-bound train passed onto the crossing, there was no smoke to obscure appellant's view east on the south main track; and if he had looked in that direction at any time between the time he stopped, 40 feet south of the track, and the time the engine of the east bound train passed onto the crossing, he would have seen the train on the south main track approaching from the east. He had an unobstructed view to the east, and he either did not look in that direction, or if he looked, did not heed what he saw. It would be no excuse that immediately afterwards the smoke obscured his view of the approaching train so that he could not see its approach. He knew it was approaching, and went upon the track at his peril. Such conduct, under the authorities cited, is negligence per se.

If, however, it were conceded that when the smoke from the engine going east on the north main track settled down on the south main track east of the crossing, and obstructed the view, the train going west had not come in sight, yet the court's action in directing a verdict was proper, for another reason: The smoke was only a temporary obstruction. Appellee's engine threw out the smoke, but it was the wind and the condition of the atmosphere that caused it to come between the appellant and the east-bound train, approaching on the south main track. Appellant knew and observed that the wind carried the smoke away, and at the time his horse stepped on the south track the smoke had cleared away so that he could see about 100 feet to the east. The train approaching was on the south main track, nearest to him. He knew that a train could and did run west on that track while trains were going east on the other track. He was thoroughly familiar with this crossing, and that such was the manner of operating the railroad. He knew that he could see ½ mile to the east, except for the smoke. He saw and knew that the wind was carrying the smoke away. Appellee had done nothing to mislead or throw him off his guard. Under the circumstances, it was his duty to wait in a place of safety until he could see and hear, and thus, with reasonable certainty, ascertain that no west-bound train was approaching on the south track. If the obstruction had been of a permanent character, the question would be a different one, but here the smoke was, as he knew, but a temporary obstruction; and, if he had but waited a few moments, he could have seen the approaching train, and avoided the injury. The case of Heaney v. Long Island R. Co. supra, is similar in this respect to this case. In that case the railroad had two main tracks, the same as in this case. The accident occurred on Atlantic avenue, in the city of Brooklyn,—a street which, for some distance, runs east and west. The deceased left his house, which was on the avenue, about 6 o'clock in the morning, and started to cross the railroad tracks at that point. The morning was cloudy and rainy or drizzly. A train had just passed on the south track, which was nearest the deceased, and the smoke from the engine settled down behind it upon the road sufficient to temporarily obscure objects in the line of vision. The deceased, however, went ahead, and while upon the north track, was struck by the north-bound train, and killed. Concerning the decedent's contributory negligence, the court said: "But we think, from the proofs, that the intestate was, as a matter of law, guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident. . . . According to the plaintiff's evidence, the deceased, after entering upon the defendant's track, went straight ahead, regardless of the smoke which was between him and the track on which he was struck. . . . We think it was unquestionably his duty to await the disappearance of the smoke, and thus be reasonably sure that he had a clear crossing. . . . We think it perfectly clear that the deceased voluntarily went upon the track,—always a situation involving peril, and calling for the vigilant exercise and use of one's senses,—when the clouds of smoke made, or tended to make, objects indistinguishable. Where a person voluntarily places himself in a position of peril, under circumstances which render him less able to protect himself by the use of his senses, he cannot fairly be deemed competent to complain of the consequent injury as due wholly to the acts of the other party. The plaintiff's proofs leave no other conclusion possible than that the deceased had failed to observe those usual precautions which the law requires of those who approach a place of peril. They must be on the alert, and vigilant in the use of their eyes and ears, and display that prudence of conduct which the situation dictates." It was held in Foran v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, that, when one drives on a railroad crossing when the smoke which has suddenly descended from a neighboring factory obscures the view which he would otherwise have had of an approaching train, he cannot recover for an injury from a collision with the train; that, as the traveler could have seen the train if it had not been for the smoke, in such case it was his duty to wait until the smoke had lifted, so that he could see that it was safe to make the crossing. The court said: "It seems to us, from the whole of the evidence, that the plaintiff received his injuries through the careless—not to say reckless—effort which he made in passing upon the tracks of the defendant while the smoke obscured his vision. The first track which was approached by the driver was the easternmost track, and it was the second track upon which the train was approaching. The plaintiff himself testified that he could not see on account of the smoke, and that what prevented his seeing the train was the trees and smoke. . . . Where smoke obscures the approach of a train, it is the duty of a passer-by to wait until the smoke has lifted so that he can see that it is safe for him to make the crossing."

The case of Whalen v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, decided by the supreme court of New York, general term, was an action to recover for injuries received at a crossing. It appeared in that case that when plaintiff approached defendant's tracks, on a dark evening, a freight train was passing eastward on one of the tracks. After the freight train had passed, plaintiff attempted to cross, but was struck by an east bound passenger train as soon as she stepped on the first track. The headlight of the passenger train was burning, and the view of the track was not obstructed. Plaintiff testified that she was prevented from seeing the approaching passenger train by the smoke from the engine of the freight train. It was held that she was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law. The court said: "Either the engine by which she was struck was in plain sight when she stepped upon the track, or it was obscured by a cloud of smoke, and it was negligence on her part to attempt the crossing until the smoke should be so far dissipated as to enable her to see whether an engine was close upon her. . . . We think the defendant was entitled to a nonsuit, on the ground of contributory negligence of the plaintiff."

In McCrory v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. supra, a verdict was directed for the defendant. The court said: "There is but one question to be determined. The railroad company was clearly negligent, not merely in violating the ordinance by an excessive rate of speed, but also in approaching this crossing without signals. The only question is whether the deceased is guilty of contributory negligence. . . . He could see in either direction. A freight train was approaching from the east, and its rumble and roar, and perhaps its whistle, attracted his attention; and coming from the west was a passenger train. There was nothing to obstruct the vision towards the west, except the matter of smoke. If he had looked, there being no smoke in the way, he must have seen the train; and there cannot be a shadow of a question but that he would have been guilty of contributory negligence, thus approaching the track without noticing it. Does this question of smoke change the case? We must remember that he was familiar with the track, because he had crossed it daily during the two months prior thereto. He must have known that there were two tracks, and that a train was liable to come on each track, and if, when approaching a track, he finds anything which temporarily obstructs his vision, it is his duty to wait until the temporary obstruction is removed. He cannot say, 'There is something temporarily obstructing my vision, but I will take it for granted that there is no danger,' and undertake to cross the track. . . . If he came to the track, and found the air full of smoke, and could not see, or, if able to see, did not look, then, and in either case, he is guilty of contributory negligence. So, whether he could see, and did not look, or could not have seen, and did not wait until that obstruction had passed away, is immaterial. One or the other must have been true, and in either event he is guilty of contributory negligence. The law lays it down clearly that a man must look and listen. And if, by looking and listening, he could ascertain the approach of a train, and fails to do so, he is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover." This case is cited and approved by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Fletcher v. Fitchburg R. Co. supra.

In Marty v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. supra, it was held that when a highway crosses a double track railway, over which trains are liable to run frequently in opposite directions, it is contributory negligence for a traveler thereon, whose view of the second track is obscured by the presence of a passing train on the track nearest to him, to pass immediately upon the crossing as soon as the way is clear, without waiting to look or listen for the approach of a train in the opposite direction. The court said: "The plaintiff was familiar with the situation and the danger, and it is quite clear that there is no reason why a man should be caught at this crossing, if he uses care and chooses to look. A trifling delay would have enabled him to look, and this precaution was the more important because the noise of the passing freight train would prevent him from hearing the approach of the other train. The evidence is clear, not conflicting, and the facts not complicated, and the case was properly passed on by the court without submitting it to the jury." It follows, then, that whether appellant could have seen before the smoke obscured his view, and did not look, or, seeing, did not heed what he saw, or could not have seen, and did not wait until the smoke had passed away, is not material. One or the other must be true, and, in any view of the case, he was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence, and it was the duty of the court to direct the jury to find for appellee. There is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

Susannah SCOTT, Appt.,
v.
CLEVELAND, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO, & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The want of a theory does not make a complaint demurrable if it states sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action.
2. Averments that a conductor negligently and carelessly mistreated a passenger in carrying her beyond her destination and in stopping at a distance from the depot and roughly ordering and forcing her to get off the train are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, where it is not alleged that she had conformed to the rules of the company and had paid her fare or offered to do so.
3. Averments that a carrier's servants carelessly and negligently caused a passenger to enter a train for which she had a ticket given her by mistake without averment of their knowledge that she did not desire to take passage on the train indicated by the ticket she held do not constitute a cause of action against the carrier.
4. A railroad company whose ticket is given by mistake to a passenger in lieu of a ticket of another company which was called for, where it was bought in a union depot of an agent who had authority to sell tickets for both companies, is not liable for the agent's mistake, since the breach of duty is that of the company whose ticket was desired.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Putnam County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for failure to properly transport plaintiff upon defendant's railroad. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. East & Miller, C. C. Matson, and S. C. Matson for appellant.

Messrs. Byron K. Elliott, William F. Elliott, and Frank L. Littleton, for appellee:

The complaint has no definite theory, and therefore is bad.

There was no negligence on the part of any agent of the appellee.

A principal is liable only for the acts of his agent done within the scope of the agent's authority. Where a person is the agent for two or more persons, and the agent performs acts within the scope of his authority as agent of one, or one principal, that principal alone, and not the others, is liable.

There was no breach of duty on the part of the conductor in carrying appellee to and beyond Greencastle.

Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Mo. 255.

Where a reasonable opportunity has been given the passenger to alight after his destination has been reached and announced, and the passenger fails to alight, his failure puts an end to the relation of carrier and passenger, and for any injury sustained by the passenger thereafter, the carrier is only liable if he would have been liable to a person under such circumstances who was not a passenger.

Imhoff v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 20 Wis. 344.

There was no actionable wrong in causing the appellant to leave the train at Terre Haute.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 580; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Head (Tex.) 15 S. W. 504.

The appellant was guilty of negligence.

A person about to enter a train to be carried to a certain point must ascertain at his peril whether or not that train will convey him to the point to which he wishes to go.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sued the appellee for damages suffered by her on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant. The circuit court sustained a several demurrer to both paragraphs of the complaint, for want of sufficient facts. The appellant refusing to amend or plead further, the appellee had judgment, upon demurrer, that plaintiff take nothing by her suit. The error assigned is upon the ruling upon the demurrer.

The substance of the first paragraph of the complaint is as follows: That on June 20, 1893, appellant resided at Bloomington, Ind., on the Louisville, New Albany, & Chicago Railway, about 40 miles south of Greencastle junction, on said road, where the Terre Haute & Indianapolis Railroad, commonly known as the "Vandalia," crosses the former; that about one mile and a half east of said junction was what was known as the "Greencastle South Depot, at both of which points all passenger trains on said Vandalia stop, and let off and take on passengers; that appellant had frequently traveled from said Bloomington to Indianapolis, Ind., by the way of said Vandalia Railroad, and knew that all passenger trains on said road stopped at each of said points; that on said day, at about 11 o'clock P. M., appellant being at the Union Depot in Indianapolis, and wholly unacquainted with appellee's road, or the stops made thereon, and desiring to return to Bloomington by way of said Vandalia, and

NOTE.—In connection with the above case as to the relation of a ticket agent in a union depot to a railroad company for which he sells tickets, see also Hillary v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) post, 32 L. R. A. —, holding that a person selling tickets in such depot is an acting ticket agent for the purpose of service of process on a company whose tickets he sells.

by way of said Greencastle Junction, she applied to an agent in said depot for a ticket over the Vandalia to Bloomington, which agent was duly authorized to sell tickets for all roads leading out of Indianapolis from said station, among which were the appellee's and the said Vandalia, though she had no knowledge of his authority to sell tickets for the appellee; that said agent negligently and carelessly gave her a ticket, for $1.85, over and by way of appellee's road, which did not pass by said Greencastle Junction, but did pass at what is known as the "North Depot" at Greencastle, Ind., but made no stop east thereof after leaving Indianapolis; that the amount paid was the usual fare rates from Indianapolis to Greencastle over both roads; that after she had purchased said ticket the appellee's agents and servants further carelessly and negligently caused her to enter one of defendant's passenger trains, then about to move west, and relying on the directions so given, and relying on the further fact that the agent so selling said ticket had given her a ticket over the said Vandalia, and believing she was then entering the train of the latter company, she entered said car, and not otherwise; that said train immediately departed, and in about an hour thereafter defendant's servants announced the station of Greencastle, and believing she was on said Vandalia Railroad, and knowing, if she was, she could not change to the Louisville, etc., Railway until she reached said Greencastle junction, a mile and a half west thereof, and appellee's servants further negligently failing to notify her that she had reached the crossing of said Louisville, etc., Railway, she remained on said train, when she was taken to the city of Terre Haute, Ind., and put off said train, in the night, in the mud and cinders, more than a half mile away from any depot, without any one to protect, guide, or direct her to a depot or hotel, and where, by reason of such negligence, she was compelled to remain for the space of twelve hours, during which time she was greatly frightened, annoyed, and humiliated, took cold, and suffered six months, and was compelled to expend $20 for medical attendance. That at the time she purchased said ticket she was sixty-five years old, crippled in her limbs, enfeebled in eyesight, and was unable to read the ticket handed her by said agent, and had no knowledge that said ticket was for passage over defendant's said railroad, and without fault in the purchase of said ticket; that she received her injuries aforesaid solely on account of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, and without any fault on her part, to her damage $5,000, for which she demands judgment. The second paragraph differs in no material respect from the first, except that in the second it is alleged, in addition to the facts averred in the first, that she made inquiries while at said Greencastle as to what the distance was to the junction, but could obtain no information thereon, and that the conductor, with full knowledge of the facts herein set forth, negligently and carelessly mistreated her, in this, to wit: that he carried her to Terre Haute, Ind., stopped his train a half mile from the depot, and there angrily and roughly ordered plaintiff from said train, and hurridly removed her therefrom, at 2 o'clock in the morning, forced her to get off, etc.

It has been the subject of much discussion as to what the true theory of the complaint is, and it has even been charged that it is bad because it has no theory. But the statute does not make the want of a theory in a complaint a ground of demurrer; but a want of sufficient facts is the only defect, in that direction, which the statute makes a ground of demurrer. If facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are stated in the complaint, it is difficult to see how a demurrer assigning want of sufficient facts could be sustained because the theory of the complaint was not apparent, or because it is difficult to tell which of two theories is the true one, where the complaint is so framed as to make either theory consistent therewith. Such a defect would be uncertainty, the remedy for which is a motion to make more certain, and not a demurrer. But we find no great difficulty here in ascertaining the true theory of the complaint. The gist of the action is the alleged negligence in delivering to appellant the wrong ticket. Her allegations of her defective eyesight, and her freedom from contributory negligence, are sufficient to excuse her for failure to read her ticket, if, indeed, it would be negligence, in any case, for a passenger to fail to read his ticket. But the appellant is slow to say whether the complaint rests on the theory of the wrong in carrying her beyond her destination, and rudely expelling her, in the night, at an unsuitable place, or for the wrong in delivering to her the wrong ticket. But let us inquire whether either paragraph is good on the latter theory, or whether either states facts sufficient to make the appellee liable for her carriage beyond Greencastle, and her final expulsion. If such carriage and expulsion form the gist of the action, then appellee's liability therefor cannot be aided or supplemented by the delivery of the wrong ticket. If such carriage and expulsion form the ground of the action, it was for the trespass, and not for negligence, which is the theory outlined in the complaint. At all events, she became a passenger on appellee's train, though she got there through a mistake of somebody. When she delivered her ticket to the conductor, she had paid her fare to Greencastle, and no further. By mistake she remained on the train, and on the way from Greencastle to Terre Haute she learned of the mistake. She was still a passenger, and entitled to be treated as such, though she was on the train beyond Greencastle by mistake. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Carper, 112 Ind. 26; Columbus, C. & I. C. R. Co. v. Powell, 40 Ind. 37. But while the appellee owed her the duty of treating her as a passenger, so as to entitle her to protection against the negligence of the company, she also owed the duty to the company of treating it as a common carrier. If there was no other relation created by the circumstances, as we shall see when coming to consider the sale of the ticket, than that of passenger and carrier, then the appellee, as a carrier, was entitled to compensation for carrying appellant beyond Greencastle, the failure to pay which, on demand, would justify the company in putting her off the train at any reasonable place. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills, 104 Ind. 13; White v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 133 Ind. 480, and authorities cited; Sage v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 134 Ind. 100. A passenger who fails and refuses to pay his fare has no right to demand to be carried to a station before the company may rightfully put him off or eject him from the train. White v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. supra. The averment that the conductor negligently and carelessly mistreated appellant in carrying her to Terre Haute, and stopped a half mile from the depot and roughly ordered her from said train, and hurridly removed her therefrom, and forced her to get off, etc., does not put the conductor in the wrong, unless his company was liable for the delivery of the wrong ticket, because it is nowhere alleged that she had conformed to the rules of the company, or that she had paid her fare, or offered to do so, without which the conductor had the right to put her off. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills and White v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. supra. That she was forced to get off may have been rendered necessary by her refusal to pay fare, or get off voluntarily on request, or otherwise failing to comply with the regulations of the appellee. If so, the conductor was justified. The presumption is against misconduct, and that presumption prevails, in favor of the conductor, until it is overcome by such allegations as put him in the wrong. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills and White v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. supra. So that it appears that the true theory of both paragraphs of the complaint is that the gist of the action is the negligence in delivering the wrong ticket. Nor is this conclusion obviated by the averment "that after she purchased said ticket, and the same was delivered to her, the defendant's . . . servants . . . carelessly and negligently ordered, directed, and caused . . . plaintiff . . . to enter one of defendant's passenger trains," because there is no averment that such servants had any knowledge that she did not desire to take passage on the train indicated by the ticket she held. So these averments, like those as to her carriage beyond Greencastle, and expulsion, have no force in showing a liability on the part of appellee, unless they derive such force from the allegations of negligence in the delivery of the wrong ticket. And even then they will derive no force from those allegations, as against appellee, unless such allegations connect the appellee with the alleged negligence in the sale of the ticket. Such connection must depend upon the question whether the appellee, in such sale, owed the appellant any duty, and whether the facts alleged show that the appellee was guilty of a breach of that duty. That there is negligence shown by both paragraphs, in the delivery of the wrong ticket, may be conceded, and that the appellant is shown therein to be free from contributory neligence in relation thereto may also be conceded. But the question remains, Whose negligence was it? It is settled law, as was said in Faris v. Hoberg, 134 Ind., at page 274, that "in every case involving actionable negligence there are necessarily three elements essential to its existence: (1) The existence of a duty on the part of the defendant to protect the plaintiff from the injury of which he complains; (2) a failure by the defendant to perform that duty; and (3) an injury to the plaintiff from such failure of the defendant." Both paragraphs show that appellant applied to the ticket agent to purchase a ticket over the Vandalia to Greencastle. They both show that he was duly authorized by the Vandalia, as its agent, to sell such tickets. Therefore, on such application and request, and on payment of the regular ticket fare, as shown in both paragraphs, a duty arose on the part of the agent of the Vandalia, and the Vandalia itself, to deliver to appellant a ticket over its road to Greencastle. It failed to do so, and therefore was guilty of a breach of the only duty that was created by the circumstances. It was as an agent of the Vandalia that he was applied to for a ticket over that road; it was as the agent of the Vandalia that he negligently failed to deliver such a ticket; and therefore the breach of duty shown was a breach of the duty that the Vandalia owed to the appellant. The application and request, accompanied by payment, for a ticket over the Vandalia, created or laid no duty on the appellee, of any kind whatsoever; and therefore, if the agent, in issuing the ticket over appellee's road, was acting within the scope of his authority as the agent of appellee,—which may admit of doubt, under the circumstances,—yet it was no breach of duty owed by appellee to appellant, because appellee owed her no duty, and had no power to perform the duty for the breach of which she complains, namely, the failure to issue to her a ticket over the Vandalia. See Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cochran, 43 Kan. 225, 7 L. R. A. 414; Isaacson v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 278, 46 Am. Rep. 142.

It follows from what we have said that the facts alleged concerning the sale of the ticket have no influence on the facts occurring afterwards, and that all of the facts stated as occurring thereafter create no other relation between the parties to this action, and impose no other duties, than those reciprocal obligations ordinarily existing between carrier and passenger. For the reasons given, both paragraphs of the complaint are bad, and the circuit court correctly sustained the demurrer thereto.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

LAMAR WATER & ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
City of LAMAR, Resp't.

(128 Mo. 188.)

1. A provision of a constitution limiting the rate of taxation for municipal purposes to a certain rate "which shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special," is not a limitation upon a subsequent provision prohibiting indebtedness to an amount exceeding the annual income "without the assent of two thirds of the voters" and requiring provisions for the collection of an annual tax to pay interest on any debt created when it falls due, and to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal.

2. The aggregate amount involved in a municipal contract the performance of which will extend over a series of years but payments upon which are to be made annually is immaterial in determining whether or not the constitutional prohibition of indebtedness exceeding revenues is infringed. It is sufficient if the revenues equal the sums falling due each year.

3. "The income and revenue provided for each year" which municipal indebtedness is forbidden by Constitution to exceed includes income from license fees and all other sources.

(April 30, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Barten County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the hydrant rents alleged to be due and unpaid under a contract between plaintiff and defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Barclay, J.:

The facts of the case appear in the opinion filed in the first division, May 28, 1894, upon the first hearing. After that ruling, a motion for rehearing was made, which was overruled, one of the judges dissenting. On that dissent, the cause was transferred to the court in banc, and there reargued.

The decision of the court in banc refers for a statement of facts to the divisional opinion, which was as follows:

BLACK, Ch. J.:

This is a suit to collect a balance of $900 due on hydrant rents for the last half of 1891, and $3,000 for the year 1892. The petition declares upon a written contract alleged to have been executed on December 31, 1890. There is the further averment that the defendant executed the contract by and through its mayor and clerk, they being duly authorized so to do, which averment is denied. The answer also raises several constitutional questions as affirmative defenses.

The record discloses the following facts: The defendant is a city of the fourth class, having 3,000 inhabitants. The board of aldermen passed an ordinance on April 21, 1890, setting forth the terms of a contract between the city on the one part and Messrs Snyder and Guinney and their assigns of the other part, for the construction and operation of waterworks by the latter. The ordinance was approved by the mayor on the 22d of the same month. The ordinance provides that it shall take effect from the date of its approval; that the contract therein contemplated shall be signed by the mayor and attested by the clerk, and signed by Snyder and Guinney; and that the contract shall take effect when the ordinance is ratified by a two-thirds vote of the voters. An election was held on May 20, 1890, at which more than two thirds of the voters voted for the contract. Snyder and Guinney then accepted in writing the terms of the ordinance. Snyder assigned his interest in the contract to Guinney, who assigned the contract to the Lamar Water Company. That corporation and the Lamar Electric Light & Power Company were duly consolidated under the name of the present plaintiff. The works were constructed, and accepted by the city, and thereupon the mayor and clerk, pursuant to a resolution of the board of aldermen, and the plaintiff, signed a contract, which is dated December 31, 1890. This contract is simply a copy of the ordinance, with a statement thereto added that the ordinance is now in full force and effect. By the 7th section of the ordinance the city agrees to and does rent 60 hydrants for twenty years, to be used for the purpose of extinguishing fires and flushing gutters and sewers, and to pay therefor $50 per annum for each hydrant, payable semiannually. The plaintiff agrees to furnish the hydrants, and keep them supplied with water, and to supply the inhabitants with water at specified rates. Section 10 secures to the city the right to purchase the works ten years after their completion at their equitable value. The company has the right to mortgage the works; and, in case they are mortgaged, the hydrant rents, or so much as may be necessary, are to be set apart as net earnings, to be paid to the holders of the interest coupons on the bonds so secured. Section 19 provides: "That for the purpose of meeting and paying the annual rental to the said A. H. Snyder and J. Guinney, their associates or assigns, by the city of Lamar, as provided in § 7 of this ordinance, there shall be levied and collected annually during the continuance of this ordinance a tax, not exceeding 40 cents on the $100 valuation on all taxable property in the city, sufficient to pay said rental if necessary. Said tax shall be levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner as are taxes for general purposes, and, when collected, the same shall be set apart for the specific purpose of paying said instalments of rental as they become due, as provided in this ordinance and shall not be appropriated to any other purpose or purposes."

The works were mortgaged for $45,000. The value of the taxable property in the city was $745,000 for 1888, $747,015 for 1889, $716,613 for 1890, and $890,160 for the year 1891.

NOTE.—On the question, What contracts will create an indebtedness within the meaning of a constitutional limitation of municipal debt, see 32 L. R. A. also note to Beard v. Hopkinsville (Ky.) 23 L. R. A. 402, also Saleno v. Neosho (Mo.) 27 L. R. A. 769.

The city levied a general tax of 50 cents on the $100 valuation for the years 1886 to and including 1892, and for the years 1891 and 1892 it levied, in addition thereto, the water tax of 40 cents. The receipts from both taxes and from licenses and all other sources, and the expenditures, were as follows: For 1890 the receipts were $8,033 and expenditures $7,903, for 1891 the receipts were $6,550 and expenditures $7,369, and for 1892 the receipts were $7,761 and the expenditures $8,339. The evidence tends to show that at the date of this contract the city had a bonded debt of $2,300. It clearly appears that in 1889 the city made a contract with the Lamar Electric Light & Power Company, whereby it agreed to pay that company annually the sum of $1,524 for a period of twenty years for electric lights.

1. It is first objected that the ordinance is void because it was passed and approved before the proposed contract had been approved by a two-thirds vote. In other words, the claim is that an election was a condition precedent to the passage of a valid ordinance. Section 1589, Rev. Stat. 1889, provides that the mayor and board of aldermen shall have power, by ordinance, upon a vote of two thirds of the qualified voters, to contract with any person or company, granting to such person or company the exclusive right to furnish gas, electricity, or water for the city and the inhabitants for a time not exceeding twenty years. We find nothing in this section which gives any support to the objection. The ordinance could not take effect as a contract until ratified by the requisite vote, but it was competent, and perfectly proper, to pass the ordinance to take effect when ratified. Indeed, an ordinance setting forth the terms of the contract, and then approved by the necessary vote, and accepted in writing by the persons proposing to build the works, was all that was necessary to make a perfect and complete contract. Section 20 of the ordinance, however, seems to contemplate a more formal contract, to be signed by the mayor for the city and by the other contracting parties. Such further formal contract was duly signed on December 31, 1890. We see no merit whatever in the objection.

2. The further objection that the contract is void because the ordinance was not referred to the city treasurer, and the second reading, for his statement, to be indorsed thereon, that a sufficient sum of money stood to the credit of the treasury, and unappropriated, to meet the requirements of the ordinance, was also properly overruled. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 1623, 1629, have no application to ordinances like the one in question. They apply to ordinances which direct warrants to be issued on the treasury, or operate as warrants; but they do not apply to ordinances which are contracts, or direct contracts, to be made for the performance of work or furnishing supplies in the future. When the work is done, or the supplies furnished, then an ordinance directing payment for the work or supplies should be referred to the treasurer for his certificate.

3. It is next objected that the ordinance is void because it is in several respects in conflict with §§ 11, 12, art. 10, of the Constitution. For the present we shall assume that the ordinance contemplates and requires the levy of a special tax of 40 cents on the $100 valuation over and above a general tax of 50 cents on the $100, to pay the hydrant rents. With this assumption the question is whether this special levy is prohibited by said sections of the Constitution. They are set out in full in the case of State, Robinson, v. Columbia, 111 Mo. 365, and need not be copied here.

In that case, the town proposed, pursuant to a two thirds vote, to issue bonds for the purpose of building waterworks and an electric-light plant, and to levy and collect annually a special tax over and above the general tax of 50 cents on the $100 valuation to pay the interest on the bonds, and to create a sinking fund to pay the principal. Our conclusion in that case was that 50 cents on the $100 valuation is the highest rate that can be levied by cities and towns of more than 1,000 and less than 10,000 inhabitants for any and all purposes, except for the purpose of erecting public buildings, and except for the purpose of paying indebtedness which existed at the date of the adoption of the Constitution; that is to say, in 1875. It was therefore held that the proposed additional tax would be illegal, because in excess of the constitutional rate limit.

That case disposes of the exact question which we now have in hand. According to the ruling then made, the ordinance in this case and the contract sued upon are utterly void in so far as they provide for the levy and collection of this special water tax of 40 cents on the $100 valuation. But it is earnestly argued in behalf of the plaintiff here that in reaching that conclusion due consideration was not given to the last clauses of § 12 The claim now made and urged in many forms of expression is that under § 12, a city may, by a two-thirds vote, go in debt for any purpose whatever, within its charter powers, up to 5 per centum of the taxable value of the property in such city; and, as the city has the right to create a debt, it has the right to levy a special tax in excess of the rates specified in § 11 to pay the debt so created. This line of reasoning is far-reaching in its consequences, for, if correct as to cities, it is correct as to counties, school districts, and townships.

That a city may levy a special annual tax, in excess of the annual rates specified in § 11, for public building purposes, and to pay debts existing at the adoption of the Constitution, is perfectly clear; and this for the plain and simple reason that § 11 excepts from the annual rates taxes levied for such purposes. But can a city exceed the fixed highest annual rates for any purpose other than for public building and to pay indebtedness existing in 1875? In answering this question it must be remembered and kept constantly before the mind that we are now dealing with annual rates of taxation. Section 11 treats of maximum annual rates, and it treats of nothing else. It enters into details, and in doing so it uses plain language. This section, it will be seen, provides that the annual rates of taxation shall not exceed the stated amounts for county purposes; that they shall not exceed the stated amounts for school purposes; and that they shall not exceed the stated amounts for city and town purposes. Cities and towns having 1,000 and less than 10,000 inhabitants are limited to 50 cents on the $100 valuation of the taxable property therein. Then follows the exception as to taxes levied to pay for public buildings? The section concludes with these words: "Said restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special, except taxes to pay valid indebtedness now existing on bonds which may be issued in renewal of such indebtedness." It is therefore perfectly clear that the maximum rates specified in this section are the highest rates that cities can levy for any and all purposes, save for the two excepted purposes, as to which no rate limit is fixed.

It is sought to break the force of this conclusion by a reference to some cases in which this court has held that local assessments, such as assessments against abutting property to pay for grading and paving streets and the like, are not special taxes within the meaning of this clause of § 11. There is a vast difference between such local assessments and a tax levied on all property for a particular purpose. The former is not a tax within the meaning of this and other clauses of the Constitution, while the latter is a special tax. The distinction between the two has been so often pointed out that we do not feel called upon to open the question. According to the plain, specific, and emphatic language of § 11, a city cannot levy an annual tax in excess of 50 cents on the $100 valuation. This is the limit of its power for any and all purposes, save in the two excepted cases, and this water tax is not within either exception.

We now go to § 12, and the first observation to be made is that it does not deal with maximum annual rates. It deals with and places a limit upon the debt-creating power of municipal and quasi municipal corporations. It first provides that "no county, city, . . shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the voters." Thus far this section is in perfect accord with § 11. Of this there can be no doubt. Section 12 provides further: "Nor in cases requiring such assent shall any indebtedness be allowed to be incurred to an amount including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding 5 per centum on the value of the taxable property therein; . . . and provided further, that any county, city, town, . . . incurring any indebtedness, requiring the assent of the voters as aforesaid, shall, before or at the time of doing so, provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also to constitute a sinking fund for payment of the principal thereof, within twenty years from the time of contracting the same."

Now, the question is, Do the clauses just quoted disturb the conclusion before stated as to maximum rates? What we are asked to do is to give to these clauses the force and effect of a proviso or third exception to the limits upon annual rates as those limits are set forth in § 11. Such a reading makes the exception concerning public buildings in § 11 meaningless. It cuts up by the roots and utterly eliminates the part of that section which says: "Such restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special."

A further and complete answer to such a reading is that these clauses of § 12 do not profess or undertake to modify or disturb the limit to rates as laid down in § 11. It should be remembered that § 11 does not require counties, cities, and school districts to levy the rates therein specified. It only specifies annual rates beyond which they cannot go. As we said in the Columbia Case, § 11 fixes annual rates beyond which cities cannot go for any purpose, except to pay for public buildings and to pay indebtedness existing when the Constitution was adopted; and § 12 places a limit upon the debt creating power of municipal corporations. There is no conflict between the two sections; for how can it be said there is a conflict in these two propositions, namely: The city of Lamar shall not levy an annual tax beyond 50 cents on the $100, and this restriction includes taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special; nor shall it go in debt, even with a two-thirds vote, to an amount exceeding 5 per centum of the value of the taxable property therein. One restriction is as binding as the other, and we have no right to dispense with either. Full force and effect must be given to each section. We have no right to build up a supposed conflict when effect can be given to both sections, and on that supposed conflict resort to construction. The purpose and meaning of the two sections are clear, and, this being so, we have nothing to do but to give to each full force and effect. Lake County Comrs. v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 32 L. ed. 1060; Barnard v. Knox County, 105 Mo. 382, 13 L. R. A. 244.

It is said the ruling made in the Columbia Case, and now made in this case, places it out of the power of many cities to obtain waterworks. If the inhabitants actually need such works, and are willing to become private customers, and pay their proper share of the expense, so that the city government will only be obliged to shoulder a fair part of the cost of furnishing water, we apprehend there will be no trouble in getting such works. But a complete answer to all arguments based on grounds of convenience and necessity is that, if some cities cannot have waterworks, save by violating the law of the land, they must go without them. We need not repeat here what has been said on other occasions as to the general object and purpose of these constitutional restrictions, nor need we speak of the causes that led to their adoption. These are matters of common information. We adhere to the rulings made in the Columbia Case.

We have thus far proceeded on the assumption that § 19 of the ordinance contemplates and requires the levy of a special tax in excess of the general tax of 50 cents on the $100. That the ordinance is open to this reading seems to be conceded by the plaintiff. But it is said the ordinance should be construed to mean a special tax of 40 cents on the $100 that can be lawfully levied; in other words, the claim is that the 40-cent special tax should be deemed and taken to be a part of the 50-cent tax.

It was said in Sheffield v. Balmer, 52 Mo.

474, 477, 14 Am. Rep. 430: "If the contract can be performed without any violation of law, then it is only a natural and legal presumption that it will be so performed, or at least there is no legal presumption that it will not be so performed." Where a contract is fairly open to two constructions, by one of which it would be lawful and the other unlawful, the former construction should be adopted. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 29 L. ed. 940; Archibald v. Thomas, 3 Cow. 284. But when the language imports illegality, the courts should not construe it in a different sense, for that would be to make a contract for the parties which they have not made themselves. 2 Parsons, Cont. 7th ed. 505.

The 19th section of the ordinance provides, as we have seen, "that for the purpose of meeting and paying the annual rental" there shall "be levied and collected annually during the continuance of this ordinance, a tax, not exceeding 40 cents on the $100 valuation, sufficient to pay said rental, if necessary. Said tax shall be levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner as are taxes for general purposes, and, when collected, the same shall be set apart for the specific purpose of paying said instalments of rental, as they become due, as provided in the ordinance and shall not be appropriated to any other purpose or purposes." The ordinance passed and approved on the same day, calling an election, provides that the ballots used in such elections shall be in the following form: "In favor of ratifying the waterworks contract, and levying the tax thereby provided for. Yes—No." The city has levied a general tax of 50 cents on the $100—the full constitutional limit—when the contract was made for that year, and for each of the four years prior thereto. After the execution of the contract it levied the general tax of 50 cents on the $100 for each of the years 1891 and 1892, and, in addition thereto, this special tax of 40 cents on the $100 valuation. This annual water contract debt and the annual electric-light debt would consume the entire general levy of 50 cents.

Now, it seems utterly unreasonable that the board of aldermen should set apart four fifths of the general tax for a period of twenty years for waterworks purposes, leaving the city nothing with which to carry on the city government, after paying the annual electric-light debt, save the income from licenses and such sources. If it had been intended to pay this waterworks contract debt out of the general tax, there was no occasion for making any mention of a special tax in the ballots; and we have seen that the board of aldermen did, in point of fact, for two years levy a special tax of 40 cents in addition to the general 50 cent tax. It is perfectly clear that the city officials and the voters also understood this special 40-cent tax to be a tax over and above the general tax of 50 cents. Turning now to the ordinance itself, we find it provides that the special tax shall be collected and set apart for the purpose of paying the hydrant rents, and to be used for no other purpose. Said tax shall be levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner as are taxes for general purposes. This language shows clearly enough that the special tax was to be a tax over and above any general tax which the city had the right and power to levy, and it excludes the idea that the special tax was to be a part of the general tax. We think this contract calls for and means a special tax of 40 per cent in addition to any general tax which the city had or has the power to levy and collect. We cannot fairly or justly give to it any other construction. It follows from what has been said that the agreement to levy and collect this special tax is unconstitutional, and therefore void.

It is next insisted that, if the agreement to levy the special tax is illegal, still the agreement to pay the specified rents is valid; in other words the contention is that the manner of paying may be separated from the agreement to pay, and the agreement to pay be held valid. Much reliance is placed upon the case of Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 342, 24 L. ed. 659.

In that case the plaintiff agreed to grade, curb, and pave certain sidewalks, and the defendant agreed to pay therefor specified prices, the work to be paid for in city bonds at par. The city compelled the plaintiffs to abandon the work after they had performed a large part of it. The plaintiff then sued to recover damages for breach of the contract. Though the city had the right to make a contract for the work, and thus bind itself for the payment of the work it was insisted as a defense that it had no power to issue the bonds. The court held that it made no difference that the promise was to pay in a manner not authorized by law; that it was not a case in which payment in bonds was prohibited; that at most the issue of bonds was unauthorized because there was a defect of power, and the corporation could be held on the contract, the suit not being on the bonds. It is there conceded that the case might be different if the corporation had been expressly prohibited from doing the act by its charter or some other law, and we think the concession distinguishes that case from the one in hand, though that case differs from this in other respects.

There is no doubt but illegal parts of a contract or statute may be disregarded when the illegal parts are severable from the other parts. But here the plaintiff agrees to furnish the hydrants with water. To pay the rents the defendants agreed to levy and collect the special tax, and set it apart for that and no other purpose. The agreement to pay by a special tax is a vital and essential part of the contract so far as the contract deals with hydrant rents. It has been held that, where a town has the power to contract for a supply of water for a period not exceeding ten years, a contract for twenty years cannot be separated so as to be good for ten years and set aside as to the excess. State, Davis, v. Harrison, 46 N. J. L. 80. That case was approved and followed by the same court in State v. Bayonne, 55 N. J. L. 241. This method of raising the money by a special tax to pay the rents was and is an important feature of this contract, and we do not see how it can be separated from the agreement to pay. To make a serverance is, in effect, to make a new contract for the parties; for the effect is to charge the general revenues of the city with the payment of this debt, which the parties agreed should be paid out of a different fund. We are of the opinion the agreement to levy and collect the prohibited tax cannot be separated from the agreement to pay. The contract is therefore, so far as it relates to the hydrant rents, void, and no action can be founded upon it.

4. In answer to some arguments made in the briefs and on the hearing of this case, we may say that the words "income and revenue provided for such year," found in the 1st clause of § 12, art. 10, of the Constitution, do not mean simply the revenue raised by a levy of tax on real and personal property. They include also the income derived from licenses and from all other sources.

In view of the conclusion before reached, it is not necessary to discuss the other objections to the ordinance, for it follows from what has been said that the judgment should be affirmed.

Barclay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It becomes necessary for the court in banc to decide for the first time whether the limitations to taxation imposed by § 11, art. 10, of the Missouri Constitution apply to a tax levied under § 12 of that article, in a city of the fourth class, for the purpose of supplying the city with water.

It will not be needful to recite the facts out of which the case arose. They have been already given in the opinion filed while the cause was in the first division (26 S. W. 1025), which will be published in the official report of the case.

1. The annual tax was held void in that opinion because adjudged by the court to be in excess of the rate permitted by § 11.

That ruling presents the first point for determination. Its importance is great; and the effect of any action upon it will be far reaching. The whole court must attempt to solve the same problem which was discussed before the first division in the Columbia Case (1892), 111 Mo. 365; and later before the court in banc in State, Tarkio, v. Seibert (1893), 116 Mo. 415. But in the latter case it was found that a decision could be reached without meeting the difficulties which now confront us.

We have given the subject patient consideration. The writer has become convinced that an endeavor to practically apply the rule announced in the Columbia Case will produce results which cannot have been intended by the Constitution, or by its authors. Hence he has felt obliged to recede from the position which his concurrence in the Columbia judgment indicated. In that case (111 Mo. 374, 376) the provisions of §§ 11 and 12 of article 10 are copied at length.* So they need not be repeated here.

The real difficulty in the way of that construction is developed by an attempt to keep those sections in harmony when so construed.

Each of the sections is entitled to receive the same respect and obedience. Neither can be wiped out for the sake of enforcing a supposed wiser policy embodied in the other.

Our duty is only to construe the law, and all parts of the Constitution are of equal moment and are equally binding upon us, as upon all other citizens of the state.

Before attempting to define our views as to the bearing of these sections on each other, let us, as briefly as possible, examine the practical consequences of attempting to maintain the construction put upon them in the Columbia litigation.

*"Sec. 11. Taxes for county, city, town, and school purposes may be levied on all subjects and objects of taxation; but the valuation of property therefor shall not exceed the valuation of the same property in such town, city, or school district for state and county purposes. For county purposes the annual rate on property in counties having $6,000,000 or less shall not, in the aggregate, exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; in counties having $6,000,000 and under $10,000,000 said rate shall not exceed 40 cents on the $100; in counties having $10,000,000 and under $30,000,000, said rate shall not exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; and in counties having $30,000,000 or more said rate shall not exceed 35 cents on the $100 valuation. For city and town purposes the annual rate on property in cities and towns having 30,000 inhabitants or more shall not, in the aggregate, exceed 100 cents on the $100 valuation; in cities and towns having less than 30,000 and over 10,000 inhabitants said rate shall not exceed 60 cents on the $100 valuation; in cities and towns having less than 10,000 and more than 1,000 inhabitants, said rate shall not exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; in towns having 1,000 inhabitants or less said rate shall not exceed 25 cents on the $100 valuation. For school purposes in districts the

In endeavoring to arrive at the probable intention of a public enactment, whether it be organic or of lesser rank, it is always permissible to consider the consequences of any construction proposed to be given to it. Such consequences have a most important bearing in aid of the interpretation of any law. For it is not to be supposed that any unjust or unreasonable results were intended to flow from the law. Hence a construction which permits such results will not be accepted by judicial interpreters, where the language is susceptible of a more beneficial reading. Rutherforth, Inst. 2d Am. ed. p. 414.

The inevitable implication in the ruling in the Columbia Case is that the provisions of § 12 for the levy of an annual tax (in the instances therein permitted) are intended to be operative within the limitations of § 11, and not otherwise. It is not, and could not be, denied that a tax may be imposed under § 12. The terms of that section are too clear on that subject to admit of question. The only doubt, or point of controversy, is whether the true intent of the Constitution should be held to sanction such a tax in excess of the rate prescribed in § 11, or whether that tax must be levied within the range of rates stated in § 11.

In seeking to discern the intent of these provisions, let us begin by examining the workings of the legal machinery along the lines defined in the Columbia suit.

Section 11 prescribes a limitation of the maximum annual tax rate (as to cities of the size of Lamar) at 50 cents on the $100 valuation of taxable property.

So that the imposition of an annual tax under § 12 (if only capable of enforcement within the restrictions of § 11) might be held (under the Columbia ruling) to produce either one of two possible results. These we shall, for convenience of treatment, designate as alternatives a and b. We will consider each of them, separately.

a. The annual tax, levied under § 12, might be held to be a fixed charge upon the local revenue, raised by the annual levy of 50 cents on the 100 dollars. So that the fund available for ordinary governmental purposes would be reduced accordingly, and would then be merely what remained after applying the tax under § 12 to its designated purpose

If that theory prevailed, an annual tax of that sort, to the limit of 50 cents on the $100, could be imposed by vote in some cities (without going beyond the 5 per centum of taxable value), leaving nothing for the usual and necessary expenses of the local government. And a corresponding reduction of annual revenue, available for the ordinary wants of the city, would follow any and every vote of indebtedness under § 12. In other words, taxes might be levied under the latter section, to meet, for example, a valid bonded indebtedness, to such an amount as to render the remainder of the annual rate (allowed by § 11) wholly inadequate to the needs of the city government.

The same thing could occur in a similar way in a county under these sections.

Yet these municipalities are agencies of the state government, and their maintenance is needed for the performance of many other functions besides the payment of debts.

The serious question which arises, upon this view of the rule in the Columbia case, is whether it is a reasonable construction of these constitutional provisions to hold that the people of these localities are authorized, by a vote under § 12, to divert to some special object for a period of twenty years, all, or such part as they please, of the general revenue raised under the rates in § 11, and imperatively needed for the support of the local autonomy.

Yet that consequence would be possible under the ruling that an annual tax under § 12 is a specific charge against the general revenue, within the limitations of § 11.

If that view, however, seems unreasonable, let us turn to the other alternative.

b. The second alternative under the Columbia ruling, would be to hold that, as § 11 plainly contemplates the imposition of the taxes (mentioned therein) to meet the vital needs of government, the annual revenue must first be devoted to those needs, leaving any residue that might remain from the prescribed annual levy, to be applied to the purpose designated by any tax levied by authority of § 12.

Of course, such a holding would reduce the supposed annual tax under § 12 to the consistency of a shadow. There would be nothing annual rate on property shall not exceed 40 cents on the $100 valuation; provided the aforesaid annual rate for school purposes may be increased, in districts formed of cities and towns, to an amount not to exceed $1 on the $100 valuation, and in other districts to an amount not to exceed 65 cents on the $100 valuation, on the condition that a majority of the voters who are taxpayers, voting at an election held to decide the question, vote for said increase. For the purpose of erecting public buildings in counties, cities, or school districts, the rates of taxation herein limited may be increased when the rate of such increase and the purpose for which it is intended shall have been submitted to a vote of the people and two thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or school district, voting at such election, shall vote therefor. The rate herein allowed to such county shall be ascertained by the amount of taxable property therein according to the last assessment for state and county purposes, and the rate allowed to each city or town by the number of inhabitants according to the last census taken under the authority of the state or of the United States; said restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special, except taxes to pay valid indebtedness now existing, or bonds which may be issued in renewal of such indebtedness.

"Sec. 12. No county, city, town, township, school district, or other political corporation or subdivision of the state shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor in any cases requiring such assent shall any indebtedness be allowed to be incurred to an amount including existing indebtedness in the aggregate exceeding 5 per cent on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the assessment next before the last assessment for state and county purposes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness; provided that with such assent any county may be allowed to become indebted to a larger amount for the erection of a court-house or jail. And, provided further that any county, city, town, township, school district, or other political corporation or subdivision of the state, incurring any indebtedness, requiring the assent of the voters as aforesaid, shall, before or at the time of doing so, provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, within twenty years from the time of contracting the same."

of substance in it. The local authorities could, at any time, by a slight enlargement of the ordinary allowances for the support of their government, cut down to zero the residuum of the annual rates of § 11. Even if they always acted in entire good faith, the probability of increasing demands upon the local revenue, during the changes of conditions in a period of twenty years, would render any dependence upon a surplus from the annual rates highly illusory.

Certainly no bonded indebtedness in these days could be founded on such a shifting sand of credit as a tax would be under § 12, so construed. What creditor could be found who would loan funds to a municipality on such a basis?

That construction of the organic law would practically eliminate the grant of power to incur an indebtedness (except for public buildings), under the provisions of § 12. Its adoption would, in effect, give the latter section another proviso, namely, "provided such annual tax shall only be payable from any surplus of the annual rates, prescribed in § 11, that may remain after the ordinary demands of the local government are met, each year."

How such a reading of the fundamental law would depart from its reasonable and natural purport, as it is now written, can be seen at a glance by any reader who will compare the closing lines of § 12 with the supposed proviso above, which attempts to express the second alternative construction possible under the Columbia Case.

After the best consideration we have been able to give to that decision, we cannot escape the impression that one of two results must necessarily follow from it: Either the general revenue of the locality may be, in great part, or wholly, absorbed for twenty years, and diverted from the maintenance of the government by the effect of an annual tax under § 12; or, on the other hand, if the absolute needs of the local government are entitled to priority of payment from the authorized revenue under § 11, then any so-called "tax" imposed under § 12 must depend wholly on the flimsy contingency whether or not any surplus remains from the regular rates after the ordinary expenses of the city, etc., have been satisfied.

Such a "tax" would be in reality no tax. It certainly would not be a "tax sufficient to pay" the indebtedness incurred, as § 12 demands. It would be a mere contingent charge against the unexpended portion of the general revenue of each year. It might never "pay" the indebtedness; and its struggle for any sort of existence would be against great odds.

So far, we have attempted to estimate the practical effects of giving § 12 play within the limitations of § 11, as required by the Columbia Case. We now ask whether either of the alternative constructions above indicated can be accepted as a reasonable and true interpretation of the meaning of the Constitution?

2. Or may not another alternative construction have been intended, one not sanctioned by the judgment in the Columbia Case, however? That is to say, may it not have been intended that the "annual tax," authorized to be imposed upon a vote, under § 12, should be levied and collected (within the limitations of that section), in addition to the annual rates for local purposes permitted (without any vote) by § 11.

If that view were taken, no such consequences as have been pointed out could follow; there would be no clash between the sections, no struggle to be settled as to which of them is of paramount authority.

Section 12 could then be regarded as a proviso to § 11, and any tax duly levied to meet a voted indebtedness would have a solid foundation on the taxable resources of the locality. Yet, on the other side, the possibility of depriving the municipality of means to sustain its government would disappear.

By that construction alone, it seems to us, can both of these sections be given full force.

The apparent obstacle to this construction is that part of § 11 which declares that "said restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special," with certain exceptions as to existing indebtedness and renewals thereof.

That provision has created the difficulty in dealing with these sections. The argument in favor of the Columbia ruling is based upon it. That argument is that a tax under § 12 is a "special" tax, within the meaning of § 11, and hence within the restrictions.

The tax authorized by § 12 is not therein called a "special" tax, but an 'annual tax." Mere names, however, are of slight weight in such an investigation. The real inquiry should be whether a tax imposed under § 12 can, upon due consideration of the practical ends in view in these sections, be held to be included by the term "special" tax in § 11, within the intent of the Constitution.

We think not; first of all, because of the singularly unreasonable consequences (already indicated) which would then be possible.

3. Furthermore, the general design and aim of §§ 11 and 12 support the assumption that the restrictions of the former as to "special" taxes were not intended to nullify the grant of power as to annual taxes authorized by § 12 to be imposed after a vote of the people.

The two sections are component parts of a system of financeering which experience pointed out as furnishing a safer course than had been previ usly followed.

Two great objects were in view, and each of the sections treated of one of them.

One object was to limit the rates of taxation for raising the annual revenue required for local purposes; the other, to limit the power to incur indebtedness beyond the annual income and revenue provided for any one year.

Section 11 deals with rates of taxation for annual revenue which may be applied by the local authorities to meet "the ordinary and current expenses" of the local government. Book v. Earl (1885) 87 Mo. 252 (Compare Const 1875, art. 9, § 10).

Section 12 deals with the subject of indebtedness, its limitations, and the ways and means to meet it when assumed.

All through § 11 "annual rates" of taxation are mentioned, and the limitations are upon those rates. In the opening lines of § 12 appears a prohibition of indebtedness "for any purpose, to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year" without the assent of two thirds of the voters, etc.

The rates of annual taxes sanctioned by § 11 are the chief source of the revenue thus mentioned. If it had been the intention that the restrictions of § 11 as to rates of taxation should apply also to taxes to meet indebtedness, then § 12 should certainly have ended at the word "jail."

To authorize the creation of indebtedness would then have been quite enough.

If the only resource for payment of such indebtedness is the revenue already allowed by the rates prescribed in § 11, what need was there to go further and authorize by the last lines of § 12 another tax levy which could only be operative within the limits of § 11. Taxes up to those limits could be levied annually under § 11, without the ceremony—rather say, farce—of levying an annual tax under the power given by § 12, which, we are told, conferred in reality no more power than already existed under § 11.

If the municipality was authorized to, and did, incur an indebtedness under the power contained in the first half of § 12, the obligation would necessarily be a charge against its revenues. Then why give further power, as is done by the second proviso of § 12, to levy any annual tax to meet such indebtedness if all the tax that could be levied was already sanctioned by § 11?

If the view expressed in the Columbia Case is sound, all of the latter proviso in § 12 (except, perhaps, as to the limit of twenty years to terms of indebtedness) could be absolutely stricken out without affecting the meaning of the Constitution in the slightest particular. Certainly all that part of it which authorizes, or rather commands, the levy of an "annual tax" would be wholly worthless and null.

But we are not authorized to adopt a construction which substantially discards a clause of such a document, if another reasonable interpretation can be stated which will give effect to that clause.

The principle of interpretation on that point is familiar, and we state it in the words of Judge Cooley:

"The rule applicable here is that effect is to be given, if possible, to the whole instrument, and to every section and clause. If different portions seem to conflict the court must harmonize them if practicable, and must lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative rather than one which may make some words idle and nugatory." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 1890, p. 72.

If the word "special," near the close of § 11, be held to apply to any special taxes that might be levied for use under the "cash system" which the Constitution establishes, but not to apply to taxes expressly authorized, by the very next section, to meet indebtedness beyond the revenue, available on the cash basis for each year, then the last proviso of § 12, permitting an annual tax to pay a voted indebtedness, would have full vigor and effect; otherwise it cannot have any force whatever.

It is therefore our duty to construe the word in that manner, under the rule defined by Judge Cooley, to save that proviso of § 12 from annihilation by construction.

4. The supreme court has definitely held that the term "special taxes," used in § 11, does not include special assessments for street improvements, although the ruling concedes that those assessments are sustainable only as an exercise of the taxing power. Farrar v. St. Louis (1883) 80 Mo. 379.

That decision tends to sustain the opinion that the special taxes referred to in § 11 are only such as come within the general purview of that section.

The context must always be kept in view in determining the meaning of any one word of an enactment. That is a general and very useful canon of interpretation.

We should not, moreover, lose sight of the fact that, at the time the Constitution was framed, certain special taxes were leviable in the counties in addition to the general levies allowed. We recall, at this time, the road tax (2 Wagner, Stat. 1872, p. 1225, § 38), and the poor house tax (2 Wagner, Stat. 1872, p. 998, §§ 8–12). There may have been others.

These taxes might have been imposed at any time by the county authorities along with the general levies.

The limit of taxation for ordinary county purposes (except in St. Louis) was 50 cents on the $100 valuation, when the Constitution was in preparation. 2 Wagner, Stat. 1872, p. 1193, § 165. Under the statute of 1865 that limit was 80 cents (Gen. Stat. 1865, p. 121, § 76), and the laws of 1855 fixed it at 40 cents (Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 1349, § 1). It was well known to the people of the state that the limit of 50 cents, in force in 1875, was barely sufficient in many counties to meet the annual requirements.

Bearing these facts in mind, what should be held to be the fair and intended scope of the term "general and special" taxes, with reference to the restrictions of § 11? Were they not intended to include all taxes for raising current revenue in the specified municipalities, as distinguished from taxes expressly authorized (by the next section) to meet indebtedness.

5. Section 11 in no manner deals with future indebtedness, or (in express terms) with taxes to meet it. It refers to taxes to pay existing indebtedness, but only in order to declare that they are not within the scope of the section or of its restrictions. That remark as to existing indebtedness is in the nature of an exception to the limitations of § 11. And how much more clearly is such an exception expressed by the plain language of § 12 (which immediately follows) as to taxes imposed thereafter upon a vote of the people on incurring new indebtedness authorized by the Constitution itself?

The provisions of § 12 on that point are designed to regulate a particular topic, namely, the laying of a "sufficient" annual tax to meet indebtedness duly incurred for certain governmental purposes upon the requisite vote. These definite and special provisions treat of one phase only of the general subject of taxation, and their situation in the organic law indicates the intent to take them out of the general declarations as to rates in § 11. Otherwise, as we have shown, those provisions of § 12 had better in fact be stricken out of the fundamental law, for they will have utterly perished by construction.

6. View the subject as we may, the restrictions on rates in § 11 cannot be applied to an annual tax authorized by § 12, without reaching results which will cancel from the organic law the second proviso of the latter section.

That must be the inevitable effect of following, and attempting to apply, the Columbia ruling.

It appears impossible to give that ruling of fact without becoming involved in difficulties the solution of which will require the interpreter to discard some part of one or the other of these sections of the organic law to reach any sort of consistent construction.

It seems first of all necessary that the funds, permitted by § 11 to be raised for the legitimate ordinary purposes of the government, should be preserved from invasion or diminution by any tax levied under § 12. Experience demonstrates that the limitations of § 11 are narrow enough, even as applied to the general needs of the municipalities which that section governs. The provisions of § 12 were not designed to cut down the annual revenue intended for the ordinary wants of the local governments. But such a cutting down would be imperative, if the first alternative ruling, already discussed, were adopted.

On the other hand, the terms of § 12 are not so drawn as to permit the conclusion that the tax levied under them was intended to be any such myth as it would be, if it depended only on a surplus remaining, each year, from the rates levied under § 11.

The only escape from these results is in the reading of those sections which we have above attempted to justify, namely, that the tax expressly authorized in the last lines of § 12 may be imposed in excess of the rates named in § 11, if the other limitations in § 12 are observed.

7. We believe also that a due consideration of the exceptions to the rate limitations of § 11 and of the exceptions in § 12 will tend to show that § 12 was never designed to be operative merely within the limits as to rates defined in § 11.

But we do not regard that point as requiring further development at this time, and in view of the other reasons that support our conclusion.

8. We believe that conclusion gives proper and full effect to the views on this topic announced by many of the learned members of the constitutional convention of 1875 during its sessions, and it is in accord with the construction which the members of the general assembly appear to have adopted in various enactments in regard to revenue.

The learned trial judge, who decided the Columbia Case on the circuit, felt bound, no doubt, to give much weight to some remarks in Barnard v. Knox County (1891) 105 Mo. 382, 13 L. R. A. 245, which seemed to point toward the result reached in the Columbia judgment. But in the Knox county case those remarks were unnecessary, and cannot be considered to have authoritative force.

Our judgment is that the ruling in the Columbia Case should no longer be followed, and that we should adopt a position which will recognize the force of all parts of §§ 11 and 12.

No doubt the Columbia ruling might better express the constitutional commands as we would wish they were written, and the learned judge who delivered it has given the best reason that can be assigned to sustain it; but we think the ruling appears faulty when practically applied, and that it will not bear the tests of time and trial.

9. If the case is to be governed by the terms of § 12, the question then arises whether the limitations of that section have been exceeded.

On that point there is some conflict in the precedents from other states; but the correct rule we think has been well stated by Judge Dillon in the latest edition of his work on Municipal Corporations, viz.:

"Under the constitutional provisions in Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, referred to, it is held that a corporation may make a contract (at least for necessaries) covering a series of years, upon which an obligation to pay may arise from year to year as the thing contracted for is furnished; and in such case, the whole amount which may ultimately become due does not constitute a debt within the constitutional prohibition. But in order to ascertain whether the corporation by such contract is transgressing the limit, regard is had only to the amount which may fall due within a certain year or other period; and if the revenues for that year or other period are sufficient, over and above the payment of the other expenses, to pay such amount, there is no debt incurred within the constitutional prohibition." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. 1890, § 136*a*.

The term "indebtedness" is a wide one, and must be construed in every case in accord with its context.

It has been very recently considered, in its application to the subject in hand, by the court in banc, and the conclusion was announced that such an obligation to pay an agreed sum, year by year, for the furnishing of certain necessary supplies during a term of twenty years, was not an immediate indebtedness for the entire amount that might ultimately become due by instalments during that term.

There is no occasion to enter into an original discussion of the reasons for that conclusion, since they have been already given in the opinion of the court in banc in Saleno v. Neosho (1895) 127 Mo. 627, 27 L. R. A. 769.

Following that decision we hold that the indebtedness created by the Lamar ordinance did not pass beyond the limits as to amount prescribed by § 12.

10. On the remaining point, as to the meaning of "income and revenue provided for such year," in § 12, we coincide with the view indicated in the divisional opinion in the present case.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

v.
JEFFERSON AVENUE RAILWAY COMPANY, Respt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A sworn statement by a witness is not inadmissible for the purpose of impeachment, when its accuracy is denied by the witness merely because it was procured by the agent of the party offering it without notice to the other party.

2. A lady passenger whose light gauzy summer dress is ignited on an open street car by a match carelessly thrown by another passenger after lighting a cigarette cannot hold the street railway company liable for her injuries, where the servant in charge of the car was not chargeable with any negligence.

(March 3, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted by fire communicated to plaintiff's clothing while in defendant's car which defendant negligently failed to extinguish. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. Gottschalk and Ed. L. Gottschalk for appellant.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is a street-car company operating its cars on Jefferson avenue in the city of St. Louis. On the 9th of August, 1891, the plaintiff, a young lady, with a companion, another young lady, Miss Barrett, was a passenger on one of defendant's cars in charge of Henry Reid, the driver. The car was what is known as a "bob-tail" horse summer car, and the driver fills the place of both conductor and driver. The plaintiff and her friend were sitting on the back seat, and the car was moving north. As the car reached a point near the northern line of Washington avenue, which it crosses almost at right angles, Henry Voss, another passenger, sitting opposite plaintiff, lit a cigarette, and attempted to throw the match out of the back door. Plaintiff was dressed in a light gauzy summer dress, and in a moment after Voss threw the match plaintiff's dress was discovered on fire. She screamed, as did the other ladies, four or five in number, and ran to the front door, and told the driver she was afire. He immediately stopped his car. In the meantime the passengers had all left the car, and plaintiff ran off screaming. Mr. J. F. Robinson, living at No. 700 Jefferson avenue, happened to be looking out of his window, and saw plaintiff's dress burning, and with great presence of mind took a quilt, and ran to her rescue, and smothered the flames as she ran up the steps of a hospital near by. Her hands and arms and side were severely burned, so much so that her left hand was crippled and rendered useless. She sues the company for the negligence of its driver, the gravamen of her complaint being contained in this allegation of her petition: "That said defendant's car was under the charge and control of its agent. That while this plaintiff was sitting in said car, to be carried to the point of destination on Jefferson avenue between Washington and Lucas avenue, her dress was set on fire on said car, and, the same threatening to burn her to death, she, being then on fire, applied to said agent and driver in charge of and managing said car for protection and assistance, which protection and assistance said defendant was by law and by its undertaking bound and obliged to render and extend to her; but that said defendant, by its said agent and driver, refused to protect or assist her, but, on the contrary, said agent and driver rudely, wrongfully, and unlawfully pushed her away, and compelled her to jump from the car, all on fire, as she then was. That the flame could easily have been extinguished at the time she applied to said driver for such protection and assistance, but by his refusal to do so, and his acts in the premises, she was awfully burned, all about her body," etc. The case was tried to a jury, and a verdict returned for the defendant, and judgment rendered accordingly. To reverse the judgment plaintiff assigns two errors: First, in admitting in evidence an affidavit made by Miss Barrett, a witness for plaintiff, to contradict her evidence on trial; second, error in the instructions. Of these, in their order.

NOTE.—As to the duty of a carrier to protect a passenger from assault by a fellow passenger, see note to Illinois C. R. Co. v. Minor (Miss.) 16 L. R. A. 627.

See also 47 L. R. A. 120.

1. When this affidavit was offered, counsel waived all objections to it save that "the affidavit was taken by an agent of defendant without notice to plaintiff." Russell v. Glasser, 93 Mo. 353. The witness did not admit she had made the statement shown her in her affidavit. She intimated very plainly that her statement had not been written down as she gave it. Nothing less than an unequivocal admission that the witness made the very statement attributed to him or her will deprive the other party of proving the statement. Peck v. Ritchie, 66 Mo. 114. That a witness may be impeached by contradictory statements made out of court will not certainly be controverted at this late day. It is elemental, and surely the fact that the contradictory statement is under the solemnity of an oath does not lessen its value for impeachment. The mere fact that the sworn statement was procured by an agent of the party offering it does not affect its competency. If it be claimed that any fraud was perpetrated in suppressing a part of the statement, or that a statement is inserted which the witness insists he did not make, he is entitled to explain it, and the whole matter is left to the trier of fact, whether court or jury, to weigh the credibility of the witness, but it does not affect the admissibility of the statement. There is no merit in this assignment. Bogie v. Nolan, 96 Mo. 85. Overruling Priest v. Way, 87 Mo. 16.

2. That the court erred in not instructing the jury as to the proper degree of care required of a carrier of passengers we think is true. While not insurers, street-car companies are carriers of passengers, and are held to that high degree of care that is demanded of other railways in carrying passengers; that is to say, the highest degree of practicable care and diligence which prudent men would observe in a like business, and under similar circumstances. Jackson v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 118 Mo. 199; Clark v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 127 Mo. 197; Waller v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 83 Mo. 608; Furnish v. Missouri P. R. Co. 102 Mo. 438. But, conceding this, how could the jury have reached a different conclusion? Plaintiff's counsel admit that the starting of the fire was in no manner attributable to any negligence on part of defendant. A fellow passenger threw a lighted match into plaintiff's dress in an open summer car. Her dress was of the lightest material, and, before defendant's driver knew anything of it, or by the exercise of the highest degree of care could have anticipated such a misfortune, the unfortunate lady was enveloped in fire. What did prudence of the highest character demand? Evidently the first step was to stop the car. This Miss Barrett, plaintiff's own witness, says the driver did immediately, and she is corroborated by all the other witnesses as to this. What next? Plainly, to aid the unfortunate young lady by assisting in using any and all appropriate means at hand to extinguish the fire. There is not a scintilla of evidence that the driver had any appliance suitable for such a purpose. Nor could it be expected that the proprietor of this horse car on a summer day would have anticipated that one of its passengers would be burned in this way. The most prudent man would never have thought of such an accident, nor have furnished such a car in such weather with fire extinguishers. The car was only 12 feet long, and the moment the plaintiff found she could not escape through the front door she ran out the rear door. The evidence of the driver, who had died in the meantime, was preserved in a deposition, and he testified he burnt his hands in the effort to assist plaintiff; that he called to Voss, who dropped the match, "to pull her dress off of her." Considering the rapidity with which her dress burned, the circumstances under which it was ignited, the promptness of the driver in stopping the car, and the escape of plaintiff from the car by the rear door before the driver could possibly reach her after halting his team, it must be ruled that this deplorable accident was in no manner the result of any negligence or wrong on the part of defendant or its servant, but was wholly attributable to the party who carelessly threw the match into the inflammable material of which plaintiff's dress was made; and there is no evidence showing that the driver could have averted the damage had he reached her before Mr. Robinson did. It is due to the driver to say that the allegations that he forced her off the car and treated plaintiff brutally were not supported by the evidence nor credited by the jury, and plaintiff's evidence of his swearing at her or pushing her can well be attributed to her very great excitement at the time. The verdict of the jury was for the right party, notwithstanding the errors in the instructions, and the judgment will not be reversed under such circumstances.

Judgment affirmed.

Sherwood and Burgess, JJ., concur.

Sherwood, J., concurring:

I would have thought the foregoing case correctly decided but for the recent decision in Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 31 S. W. 115, where it is said: "All the facts which made the sewer dangerous might fairly have been found to be within the knowledge of the city officials after the lapse of time following the fire. . . . Carefully managed sewers do not, according to the common experience of men, usually blow up, and scatter destruction and death. Such a performance is of itself entitled to consideration, on the issue of care in respect of such property; or, as some jurists have said, 'The thing itself speaks.' Had the cover of the large opening west of the saloon been removed, so as to allow the direct escape of the gas at that point, it may be that the disaster would have been avoided. It was not removed; nor do any other steps appear to have been taken in regard to the care of the sewer by the city authorities after the flow of the oil into it on the 22d of July. It is not always consistent with common prudence to await a catastrophe before taking precautions against it. Nor is it conclusive of careful managment that a particular disaster has never before occurred. . . . To what extent such foresight is demanded by the duty to use ordinary care it would be very difficult to say. We shall not attempt to generalize on that topic now." And so the action of the trial court in that case in granting a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence was reversed, and the cause remanded. Adopting the language just quoted as peculiarly applicable to the case at bar, wherein (like Fuchs' Case) no such accident, it seems, had ever occurred in a street car before, let me apply to the case in hand the principles so succinctly and lucidly announced and luminously expounded in Fuchs' Case. And in making such application I find that this case is far stronger in its facts for warranting a recovery than that case, for the reason that matches, since their invention, and when in careless hands, have frequently set fire to dresses and other things, thereby causing extensive conflagrations. And it is a well-known fact (a fact so well known that judicial notice may be taken of it) that men ride in these "open summer cars," that while thus riding it is quite a common occurrence for them to light and smoke cigarettes. And it is also a common and well-known fact that ladies, in warm weather, frequently wear dresses of a light, gauzy, and tinder-like material, as that worn by plaintiff. So that on that 9th day of August, 1891, in that "open summer car," you have assembled in close juxtaposition all of the constituent elements and conditions necessary to cause the injury which actually did occur. True, it does not appear that a lady's dress ever took fire from the careless dropping of a match in an "open summer car," but that such and similar occurrences have taken place from that and similar causes in other localities is a matter of common knowledge and common observation; while, on the other hand, such an accident as that of a sewer exploding has never (according to the evidence in Fuchs' Case) occurred before since this terrene first swung her green disk into her ceaseless orbit around the sun. So that in the case at bar you have present the conditions and the possibility of plaintiff's dress taking fire, coupled with the probability that it would do so from the fact that dresses and similar materials had done so in other instances and in other localities, where were assembled together gauzy dresses, careless fingers, matches, and a motive for the latter's ignition. Besides, it is not to be overlooked that in this case there was due to plaintiff from the defendant company the "highest degree of care," while from the defendant city, in Fuchs' Case, there was due (if, indeed, any degree of care at all in respect to an unexpected explosion of gases) only ordinary care. Nor is it to be forgotten that in the latter case the city was engaged in the performance of a public and governmental duty, promotive of the public health, in the discharge of which duty a municipality is never held liable, while the defendant company in this instance was pursuing its own private business as a common carrier, for its own private gain. When I thus contrast the facts in Fuchs' Case with those in the present action, when I consider the higher degree of care due in the latter case, when I consider also that accidents of ladies' dresses catching fire are of frequent occurrence and of public notoriety, but that explosions from gases in sewers never had occurred before the Fuchs incident, and yet that in the Fuchs' Case the city was held prima facie liable, though no means or causes were pointed out, either in the petition or in the opinion, whereby the city could have anticipated or prevented the accident,—I feel constrained to say, while following the lines laid down in that case, that if it was the duty of the city (required only to exercise ordinary care) to anticipate and to provide against the unexpected, and to formulate means and measures to prevent the occurrence of something which it had never entered into the heart of man to conceive of as possible, that then in this case "all the facts which made the open summer car dangerous might fairly have been found to be within the knowledge of the defendant's officials after the lapse of time following the fire," catching ladies' dresses for so many years, and in so many various ways and localities, prior to the building of defendant's road, that, therefore, it cannot be logically or lawfully said, as is said in this case (if Fuchs' Case contains either logic or law): "Nor could it be expected that the proprietor of this horse car, on a summer day, would have anticipated that one of the passengers would have been burned in this way. The most prudent man would never have thought of such an accident, nor have furnished such a car with fire extingishers." And, coupling together by quotation and paraphrase the forceful thoughts of my two distinguished associates within the narrow confines of a single page, I may, using as few as possible of my own poor words, by way of comment, observe further that, had such fire extinguishers, or a tank of water on top of the car, with suitable hose attached, extending down into the car, been provided, "so as to allow the direct escape" of water at that point onto the burning dress, "it may be that the disaster would have been avoided." But neither extinguishers nor tank, etc., were provided, "nor do any other steps appear to have been taken in regard to the care of the car by the defendant's authorities." On "carefully managed" horse cars, "according to the common experience of men," cigarette smokers do not usually cast burning matches on ladies' dresses, and thereby scatter flames and danger of a burning death. "It is not always consistent with common prudence to await a catastrophe before taking precautions against it." No matter whether you have any reason to anticipate such a catastrophe or not, or whether, anticipating it, you could have done anything to prevent it. "Nor is it conclusive of careful management that a particular disaster has never before occurred." "To what extent such foresight is demanded by the duty to use ordinary care it would be very difficult to say." It would seem so, and it would further seem that if this court, with all the facts before it which constituted and caused the unexpected and litigated injury, declares it "very difficult to say" "to what extent such foresight is demanded by the duty to use ordinary care," that assuredly a defendant should not be required to more clearly perceive by its "foresight" the extent of its precautionary duty than this court with all the light of surrounding circumstances is able to perceive after looking through its "hindsight." But I "shall not attempt to generalize (or particularize) on that topic now." In conclusion, I am forced to say that it will require something more penetrating and powerful than a cathode ray to discover and discern the why and the wherefore that the plaintiff in Fuchs' Case should win and the plaintiff in this case lose.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Jersey, CONSOLIDATED TRACTION COMPANY, Prosecutor,
v.
The City of ELIZABETH.

[(.....N. J.....)

1. The presumption is that an ordinance within the powers granted to a municipality in its charter is reasonable, unless from its inherent character or from evidence it is demonstrated to be unreasonable.

2. An ordinance prohibiting the use of salt on a street railway track except on curves at street corners is not invalid as an impairment of the franchise of a street railway company, or a restriction of the operation of its road, merely because it will occasion inconvenience, or involve expense, or prevent the company from operating its road so successfully.

3. Evidence that the use of salt is necessary to make it possible to run street cars at a low place in which the water gathers during the day and freezes at night is not sufficient to show that an ordinance prohibiting the use of salt is unreasonable, where it does not appear that at reasonable expense the water cannot be diverted from the tracks.

CERTIORARI to test the validity of an ordinance of the City of Elizabeth prohibiting the use of salt upon street-car tracks. Dismissed.

The material provisions of the ordinance were "that hereafter no person or persons, corporation or corporations shall put, throw, or place salt, rock salt, saltpetre, or any other kind of salt, or cause the same to be put, thrown, or placed on any street railway track or other part of the street or streets within the city of Elizabeth, under a penalty of $10 for each offense, provided that any street railway company may use salt, rock salt, or saltpetre on all curves of their railways leading from one street or avenue into another street or avenue running at right angles therewith."

Mr. Frank Bergen, for prosecutor:

A right granted by statute cannot be taken away by an ordinance.

Allen v. Jersey City, 53 N. J. L. 522; State, North Hudson County R. Co., v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71; State, Hudson Teleph. Co., v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 303; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 319-327, 374; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 240.

The prosecutor, by virtue of the act under which it was organized, has express authority to enter upon any street on which a street railway is or may be constructed with the consent of its owners and operate the same without the consent of the municipality, and, in so far as the ordinance in question interferes with the operation of the street railroads of the prosecutor in Elizabeth without reasonable cause, it is in conflict with the traction act of 1893, and with the rights of the prosecutor.

Mr. James C. Connolly, for defendant:

The city is bound to keep its streets in a clean and healthy condition, and may prohibit the depositing of anything on the street which may prove injurious to the public or add to the accumulations which are removed, from time to time, at the expense of the public.

Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. v. New York, 47 Hun, 221.

The city has full control over its streets, and may forbid the removal of snow in any manner.

The city may enforce whatever reasonable regulations may be necessary to prevent injury to the public or to private persons.

Where a municipality legislates on a matter clearly within it power, its regulations will not be regarded as unreasonable. The party who attacks such regulations must show that they are unreasonable.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ordinance under review was passed in virtue of § 31, subd. 7, and § 32, of the city charter (Pub. Laws 1863, pp. 118–123). It is contended by the prosecutor that the ordinance is invalid for two reasons: First, that it is unreasonable; and, second, that it is an invasion of the legal rights of the prosecutor in respect of the company's exercise of its franchises within city limits.

NOTE.—As to the use of salt on railway tracks to prevent freezing, see also Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (W. Va.) post, —.

The power of the municipality, by ordinance, to make reasonable regulations controlling the operations of street-railway companies within the city is undoubted. The franchise granted to those companies, to use the streets of the city for railroad purposes, affords no immunity from any police control to which a citizen could be subjected. State, Trenton Horse R. Co., v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132, 11 L. R. A. 410. The ordinance set aside in the North Hudson County R. Case was an ordinance requiring the company to pay an annual license fee for each of its cars, the amount of which fee was such as to show that the ordinance was intended for the purposes of revenue, and the city had not the requisite power to exercise the licensing power to provide revenue. The court distinctly affirmed the validity of ordinances of the character of the ordinance in question, if they were reasonable, and held that the legislature, when it authorized the use of the public streets for such purposes, is presumed to have intended that the grantee of the franchises should hold its privileges subject to such regulations as are reasonably necessary for the common use of the street for a street railway and for ordinary travel. State, North Hudson County R. Co., v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71. The subject of municipal regulation of street railroads is fully discussed in Booth, Street Railway Law, §§ 223–239, inclusive. The liability of this company to municipal regulation by the city of Elizabeth is also affirmed by the terms of the law under which it holds and exercises its franchises. The main branch of its street railway system was constructed by the Elizabeth & Newark Horse-Railroad Company,—a company incorporated by a special act passed March 25, 1864. The 15th section of that company's charter enacts "that the said company shall within the limits of the city of Elizabeth in all things be subject to the provisions of the charter and ordinances of said city, now or hereafter to be in force." Pub. Laws 1864, p. 504. The rest of its tracks in the city were laid by the Union County Street Railway Company, which was incorporated under the general railroad act of 1886, the 19th section of which empowered the municipal authorities to establish such reasonable regulations as to the mode of use of the tracks, and the removal of snow and ice therefrom, as the interest and convenience of the public may require. Pub. Laws 1886, pp. 185–193. Subsequently, by consolidations and leases, the property and franchises of these two companies becamed vested in the Consolidated Traction Company, the prosecutor in this case. That consolidation did not enlarge the franchises, powers, or privileges of the original companies in the city of Elizabeth, and the new company took the rights and franchises it acquired by the consolidation subject to the original conditions and limitations. State, Wilbur, v. Trenton Pass. R. Co. 57 N. J. L. 212. The contention of the prosecutor is that the use of salt in removing ice from its tracks is not attended with any inconvenience, discomfort, or injurious consequences to the public, and the ordinance therefore is an arbitrary and unreasonable interference with the company in the management of its property and the conduct of its business. Much evidence on both sides of this controversy, consisting of the testimony of experts taken under the rule, and pamphlets and official reports on the subject, has been laid before the court. Where an ordinance is within the powers granted to the municipality in its charter, the presumption is that it is reasonable. The judicial power to declare it void can be exerted only when, from the inherent character of the ordinance, or from evidence taken showing its operation, it is demonstrated to be unreasonable. State, Trenton Horse R. Co., v. Trenton, 53 N. J. L. 132–140, 11 L. R. A. 410; Paxson v. Sweet, 13 N. J. L. 196; Booth, Street Railway Law, §§ 224–230. The ordinance was passed by the unanimous vote of the city council and was signed by the mayor. The testimony with respect to the injurious effects of the use of salt in removing snow and ice from railroad tracks is conflicting, and is not of such force and effect in favor of the prosecutor's contention as would justify us in condemning the official action of the city authorities.

The second ground on which the ordinance is assailed is that it impairs the company's franchises to such a degree as to be unlawful. These companies possess franchises acquired under the authority of the state legislature. The argument was that the prosecutor, having complied in all respects with the conditions upon which its use of the streets became entirely lawful, to the full extent of its grant of franchises, was therefore entitled to have such use of the streets as would enable the company to exercise its franchises therein as fully as authorized by the legislative grant, unimpaired by municipal interference. The power granted to municipal bodies to legislate by ordinance is undoubtedly a grant to a subordinate body, and its legislative acts, when counter to the acts of the state legislature, must therefore give way; but these companies nevertheless hold their franchises subject to such municipal regulations as do not unreasonably or unnecessarily interfere with the exercise of the franchises conferred by the legislature. Allen v. Jersey City, 53 N. J. L. 522. In considering this ground of objection, the status of these companies in their use of the streets must be borne in mind. A street-railroad company uses as its roadbed public streets, provided and improved at public expense, and acquired and held for the benefit and advantage of the public at large. In this respect such a company occupies a position different from that of a railroad company, exercising its franchises and transacting its business upon a roadbed provided at its own cost and for its exclusive use, except at crossings over streets and highways. The legislature, in authorizing a street-railway company to make use of the public streets, intended that the grantee of such privileges should be subject to municipal regulations of a greater scope than would be allowable in the case of companies occupying and using their own roadbed. To justify the vacation by the court of an ordinance regulating a street-railroad company's use of the street, which otherwise would be legal, on the ground that it impaired the company's franchises, or restricted the operation of its railroad, the proof should amount to a demonstration that the enforcement of the ordinance will necessarily have that effect. That the company cannot so successfully operate its road under the restrictions prescribed by the ordinance, which would occasion inconvenience or involve expense, will not be sufficient to justify such judicial action. Within the limits here indicated, the subject must be left to the judgment and discretion of the municipal authorities. In the Allen Case the company whose rights were involved was a steam railroad company, operating its railroad exclusively under legislative authority, upon its own roadbed, and making no use of the streets except at the crossings of their tracks over them. The effect of the ordinance which the court held inoperative as against the company in making a crossing over streets, if enforceable against the company or its workmen, would necessarily have been to make the franchises of the company exercisible only by the consent of the board of aldermen, and to subject its right to exercise its franchises under its charter to the will of the legislative department of the city government. In Union R. Co. v. Cambridge, 11 Allen, 287, a city ordinance which absolutely forbade the removal of snow and ice from the tracks of a street railroad was sustained. The ordinance in question was passed under a statute identical in language with the 19th section of the general railroad act of 1886, quoted above. The contention on behalf of the company in that case, as it has been on this argument, was that the company, having the franchise to lay down a railway in the streets and run cars upon it, had, as incident to such franchise, a right to do whatever was necessary to make the use available, and therefore the right to remove obstructions of snow and ice which might impede or wholly stop the running of its cars. The ordinance nevertheless was sustained, and, upon this contention of the company, the reasoning of the court was that the use of the street was granted to the company only in common with others; that the snow and ice which it might be desirable or necessary for the company's purposes to remove might be very important for the convenience of other travelers to retain, and that the preponderance of public convenience should govern; that the power and duty of deciding which course was advisable were vested by law in the city authorities, and it was not to be supposed that their decision was made without good reason. And in Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. v. New York, 47 Hun, 221, an ordinance prohibiting the use of sand on a street railway was held to be valid, although it was alleged by the company that the pavement, by use, had become so worn and slippery that otherwise it could not run its cars with safety to its horses. It is not necessary, under the proofs in this case, to affirm or deny a power in the city government over street railroads as extensive and far-reaching as was held in the opinion of the court in the Cambridge Case. The evidence produced by the prosecutor touching the necessity for the use of salt to remove snow and ice from its tracks consisted of the testimony of its superintendent. He testified that in places where the tracks are low and the pavement high as in Elizabeth avenue, salt is needed to remove the snow; that, when the snow gets frozen on the rail, it cannot be got off with a snowplow and sweeper; that the only remedy is to use salt; and that the grades on which salt is required extend only a couple of hundred feet on either side of the Central Railroad. He also testified that in the middle of the day the water from the tracks would run to the low places, and freeze at night, and in the morning it would be impossible to run the cars unless salt is used on these low places, and that the removal of ice from the track by the use of salt was more necessary when the cars are propelled by electricity than with horse cars. The import of this testimony is that the situation in which the use of salt is required is limited, and it in no wise appears that the company could not provide for the diversion of water from this part of its tracks in some manner at a reasonable expense. This testimony falls short of that measure of proof which would justify the vacation by the court of this ordinance.

The writ should be dismissed.

GERMAN-AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

SAME
v.
ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

SAME
v.
EQUITABLE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The existence of a real difference arising out of an honest effort between insurer and insured is necessary to make operative a provision in a policy for arbitration of differences.
2. A mere general objection to a statement of loss, without pointing out in detail the items excepted to, will not constitute such a failure to agree as makes a case for arbitration under an insurance policy.
3. Appraisers in an insurance case act in a quasi-judicial capacity, and must be free from bias in favor of either party.
4. An insurer cannot demand an appraisal and arbitration of the amount of loss while denying all liability under the policy.
5. An appraiser chosen by an insurer cannot demand that an umpire be selected who does not live in the vicinity of the property.
6. An unreasonable demand of an appraiser for the insurer that an umpire be chosen who does not live in the vicinity amounts to a waiver of arbitration.
7. The market value of property destroyed, so far as it is covered by insurance policies, is the amount to be recovered.

(February 13, 1896.)

NOTE.—For effect of unreasonable rejection by insurer of umpire from locality of fire, see also Brock v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. (Mich.) 26 L. R. A. 623, and Chapman v. Rockford Ins. Co. (Wis.) 28 L. R. A. 405.

APPEALS by defendants from judgments of the Circuit Court for Coffee County in favor of plaintiffs in actions brought to recover the amounts alleged to be due on certain policies of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lellyett & Barr, for appellants:

The condition of the policy that the amount of loss or damage of the property insured shall be submitted to the appraisal of competent and impartial persons, to be chosen as therein provided, whose award shall be conclusive as to the amount of such loss and damage only, and shall not determine the question of the liability of the company, and that until such an appraisal shall have been permitted and such an award obtained the loss shall not be payable and no action shall lie against the company, the appraisal being made a condition precedent to the payment of any loss and to the maintenance of any action, is valid and binding.

An agreement in a policy of insurance that if any difference arises with respect to the amount of the claim for loss or damage by fire, such difference shall be submitted to arbitrators indifferently chosen, whose award or that of the umpire shall be conclusive, etc., and that no suit or action on this policy shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery until after an award shall have been obtained fixing the amount of such claim in the manner above provided, is not void as against public policy and such submission and award are a condition precedent to any action on the policy, unless performance has been refused or waived by the company.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs, L. D. Hickerson & Co., were insured against loss by fire in the three companies above named, the property insured being lumber, in a yard owned by them at Tullahoma, Tenn. The property having been destroyed by fire, suit was brought upon the policies. The causes were consolidated, and heard before the court and a jury, and a verdict was rendered against the companies separately, to wit: Against the German American Insurance Company for $1,834.94; the Royal Insurance Company, $1,834.94; and the Equitable for $918.57,—or a total of $4,588.45. The plaintiff remitted $34 94 each as against the first named companies, so as to reduce the judgment against them to $1,800 each, the amount sued for in the summons, leaving the aggregate amounts of the judgments rendered $4,508.57.

It is insisted that the suits cannot be maintained under the provisions of what is termed the "arbitration" or "appraisement" clauses in the several policies. These clauses are substantially the same in each of the policies, and are the usual clauses found in the great majority of fire policies. We quote from the policy of the Royal Insurance Company, the others being in substance and effect the same: "The amount of sound value and of the damage shall be determined by mutual agreement between the company and the assured, or, failing thus to agree, the same shall then be immediately ascertained by a detailed appraisal by competent persons, etc., one to be appointed by the assured, and one by the company (which two persons shall, in case of a disagreement, appoint a third); and their report, rendered in detail in writing, and made under oath, shall be binding on the company and the assured as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the legal liability of the company under this policy." And again: "Until such notice as aforesaid is given, particular account and certificate produced, examinations and appraisals permitted by the assured, the loss shall not be payable." Again: "It is hereby expressly provided that no suit or action against this company for the recovery of any claim under or by virtue of this policy shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after an award shall have been obtained fixing the amount of such claim in the manner heretofore provided," etc. Similar clauses and provisions in fire policies have been upheld in the courts, the leading case being Hamilton v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 242, 34 L. ed. 419, where other authorities are collated. In some courts such provisions have been declared invalid, and in others they have been much limited and circumscribed. See Biddle, Ins. § 1153. In no tribunal have they been allowed to oust the courts of their jurisdiction (Biddle, Ins. § 1153); and they must be so construed as, upon the one hand, to protect the companies from fraudulent claims, and, at the same time, to secure the insured in the collection of his honest dues. It is evident that the object of such provisions is to furnish an easy court of appraisal and arbitration to settle real differences of estimate and opinion, without the delay and cost of a suit for that purpose. Until such real difference has arisen out of an honest effort between the insurer and insured, there is neither occasion nor authority for an appraisal and arbitration. In Beach, on Insurance (§ 1244) it is said, quoting from Vangindertaelen v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 82 Wis. 112, "the arbitration was only provided for in case the parties failed to agree." And again: "The provision making such award a condition precedent to the commencement of a suit upon that policy presupposes such failure to agree and consequent arbitration." Again, in § 1310, it is said: "An allegation that the insured furnished such proof, and offered in writing to arbitrate the amount of the loss, but that the company refused such arbitration, and refused to pay the insurance or any part of it, but not averring a failure to agree upon the amount, was held not to show a right to resort to arbitration," on the part of the insured. In Boyle v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. 169 Pa. 349, it is held, in substance, that there is no authority for the appointment of appraisers when the insurers and the insured have made no effort to agree and settle between themselves. See also Chapman v. Rockford Ins. Co. 89 Wis. 572, 28 L. R. A. 405; Fanum v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 83 Cal. 246; Biddle, Ins. § 1157.

It appears in this case that Curry, an adjuster, went to the complainant's books, and compared the original approximate statement of loss made by them with the books, and found what he claimed were discrepancies. To these he objected, and a revised statement was more carefully prepared from the books by the plaintiffs and submitted to the companies; but this does not appear to have been examined by the companies, and no counter statement was made to show the real account, as the companies understood it, but an appraisement was demanded, without further effort to arrive at the loss. These provisions in insurance policies are not intended to introduce or establish any new system for the adjustment of losses by fire that does not obtain in other business settlements and transactions. It was never intended that an appraisal should be demanded by either party before any occasion for it had arisen; otherwise, they would both prove instruments to delay the settlement of losses, instead of aiding in their settlement. Upon the happening of a fire loss, the insured is required to give notice and furnish a detailed statement of his loss. When this is received by the company it is incumbent on the company to examine the same; and if not agreed to, specific objections must be pointed out by the company and an honest effort must then be made to adjust the difference. A mere general objection to the proofs without pointing out in detail the items excepted to, will not be sufficient, but the objection must be so specific, with detail of items, as to enable the assured to see upon what points differences exist; and a counter statement, if necessary, should be furnished, showing the contention of the companies in such way that the difference, if practicable, may be adjusted and settled. If this shall fail after an honest effort is made, an appraisal may be demanded by either party, and only in such event. In the selection of appraisers, it is not contemplated that either party shall select a person with a view to sustain his own views or further his own interest, but the appraisers are to act in a quasi judicial capacity, and as a court selected by the parties, free from all partiality and bias in favor of either party and so as to do equal justice between them. This tribunal, selected to act instead of the court and in place of the court must be, like a court, impartial, and not partisan; and, if these provisions are not carried out in the spirit and for this purpose, neither party is precluded from going into the courts to reach his just deserts, notwithstanding the provisions In many courts it has been held that such demand for appraisal is a waiver of other defenses upon the part of the insurer, notwithstanding the policy may provide that the award shall be binding only as to the amount of loss, and shall not decide the liability of the company under the policy. Upon reason it would seem that this result should follow, as it would only be a farce to adjust the amount of loss when the company denied liability for any amount. In such case the company has nothing to arbitrate, and the amount of damage is a matter to determine only after the preliminary questions of liability have been conceded or adjudged.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the insurer cannot demand an appraisal and arbitration of the amount of loss while at the same time it denies all liability under its policy; and a demand for appraisal by the insurer is a waiver of other defenses going to the question of liability. Lasher v. North-Western Nat. Ins. Co. 18 Hun, 98; Rosenwald v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 50 Hun, 172; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc Law, p. 354; Beach, Ins. § 1244; Boyle v. Hamburg Bremen F. Ins. Co. supra; Western Horse & C. Ins. Co. v. Putnam, 20 Neb. 331; Bailey v. Ætna Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 336; German American Ins. Co. v. Etherton, 25 Neb. 505; Wainer v. Milford Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mass.) 11 L. R. A. 599, and note; Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 83 Cal 246, cited in Savage v. Phœnix Ins. Co. (Mont) 33 Am. St. Rep. 591, and note p. 599. In Biddle on Insurance (§ 1175) it is said: "When the insurer declines to recognize any liability to pay, this does not constitute a dispute, and the arbitration provisions are waived by such refusal." Beach says (§ 1244): "If the company denies its liability for the loss, there would be nothing, from its standpoint, to arbitrate. Hence the rule that such a provision is a condition precedent to a right to bring action on the policy does not apply when the company denies its liability."

In the case at bar an appraisement was demanded by the insurance company, and the selection of arbitrators required by them, without any real occasion therefor, so far as we can see from this record, and without any proper effort to otherwise adjust the loss, such as the policy contemplates, and before any differences had arisen, and the insured need not have consented thereto. It was, however, submitted to by the insured, and submission papers were drawn up by the companies, and handed to the insured and they were requested and required to name a party to act as their appraiser, which they did, and an appraiser was afterwards named by the companies. The appraiser selected by the insured was a resident of the vicinity of the fire. The appraiser selected by the companies was a resident of Nashville, Tennessee. Why a resident of another locality than that where the loss occurred was selected does not appear. It appears that the two appraisers attempted to select an umpire before they made any effort to agree between themselves upon the amount of loss, and before any difference had arisen between them. It appears to have been treated as one of the legal requirements of the policy and terms of submission, and tacitly assented to. In their efforts to agree upon an umpire, the appraiser of the companies submitted to the appraiser of the insured the names of the nine persons, none of whom lived in the locality of the fire. One lived at Murfreesboro, the others, at Nashville, Knoxville, Cincinnati, and Louisville. None of them were personally known to the appraiser of the insured. The appraiser of the insured submitted some eight or ten names of persons living in the vicinity, but none of them were acceptable to the companies' appraiser, and but one of them was known to him, though they could have been easily inquired about in the community. The companies' appraiser states that he insisted that, in fairness to all parties, some one should be selected who did not live in the vicinity; while the insured appraiser insisted that the umpire should be selected from the same locality as the fire, from persons who were conversant with prices, and he suggested every mill and business man whom he deemed competent, but the companies' appraiser would accept none of them. The appraiser of the insured states, further, that he suggested the name of a Louisville man, who happened at that time to be in the locality, and without having conferred with him. The appraiser for the companies assented, but afterwards asked the privilege of talking to him, and, after this was done, he declined to accept him. Thereupon the appraiser of the insured notified the appraiser of the companies that, having spent two days in an unsuccessful attempt to agree upon an umpire, there was nothing left for him to do. In his deposition he states that he made an honest effort to agree upon an umpire, and could not, and that he was not directed in what he did by the plaintiffs.

This is a short statement of what is apparent from the record as a tedious and unjustifiable wrangle over the selection of an umpire, before the necessity or occasion for one had arisen. It appears from the record that, while the insurance companies were thus insisting upon an appraisal, they were at the same time demanding further proof of loss, and a compliance with other provisions of the policy, and warning the insured that the adjudication of the amount of loss by appraisers would not be conclusive as to their liability under the policies. In this connection the case of Brock v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 102 Mich. 583, 26 L. R. A. 623, is in point. It is there said: "The term 'disinterested'" as applied to appraisers, "does not mean simply lack of pecuniary interest, but requires the appraiser to be one not biased or prejudiced. The defendant selected as the appraiser an insurance adjuster residing at Grand Rapids, a point 135 miles distant from the place where the fire occurred. The two disagreed as to the selection of an umpire. Defendant's appraiser then suggested the names of three persons, one of whom resided in Grand Rapids, one in Lansing, and the third at Saginaw. The agreement does not contemplate that the umpire shall be selected at random, or without some knowledge on the part of both appraisers as to his competency and fitness. Parties living in the locality would naturally be best qualified to pass upon the question of values, and an appraiser would not be under obligation to make trips to other localities than that of the fire to ascertain as to the propriety of appointing the person suggested as an umpire. . . . Strangers to the locality are not usually selected as appraisers and, in case of the inability of the appraisers to agree, a third party known to both, and in whom both have confidence, is supposed to be selected. . . . Defendant's appraiser insisted upon the appointment of a person with whom he was personally acquainted, who was a stranger to the locality and to plaintiff's appraiser. The latter offered the names of twelve residents of the locality from which the jury, in case of suit, would be drawn. No valid reason is assigned for a refusal to accept one of the twelve, and the only reason given is that he did not care to take the chances of getting one that would be partial. The requirement that plaintiff's appraiser should go into other portions of the state to make inquiry as to the fitness of the persons named was not a reasonable one. The suggestion that some one be selected from the locality of the fire was not unreasonable. It is well settled that where the conduct of the company's appraiser in refusing to agree on an umpire, is inexcusable, and virtually amounts to a refusal to proceed with the appraisement, the fact that the appraisement was not concluded before suit was brought will not bar an action on the policy. McCullough v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 113 Mo. 606; Bishop v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 488; Uhrig v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 362; Bradshaw v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 137 N. Y. 137."

In the McCullough Case, above cited, the court says: "The appraisers could not agree as to the value of the property destroyed or the amount of damages sustained, nor could they agree on the third man. McGraw (the appraiser for the insured) then suggested the names of four or five persons, some of whom resided in the county, some at Boonville, and some at other points not far distant. White (appraiser of the company) would not agree to either of them, and suggested the names of some others living in St. Joseph, Kansas City, and St. Louis, at least 200 miles distant from where the fire occurred. McGraw would not agree to any of the persons suggested, because of the remoteness from the place of the fire, and their want of knowledge of the value of the property in that locality, but White would not agree to any other person. His course, to say the least of it, was unreasonable, unjust, and tantamount to a refusal to proceed with the appraisement. Justice and fair dealing did not require the plaintiffs to wait longer than they did before instituting their suit." In Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Bishop, 154 Ill. 9, it was held that where the appraiser of the company refuses to agree upon an umpire living in the vicinity of the fire, and insists upon a person of whom the other appraiser knows nothing, the insured is relieved from the necessity of an award before bringing suit. In Braddy v. New York Bowers Ins. Co. 115 N. C. 354, it was held that it was not unreasonable on the part of the appraiser of the insured to object to an umpire suggested by the insurer of the company, upon the ground that he was unknown to the former, and that he lived remote from the place of the fire. In Chapman v. Rockford Ins. Co. 89 Wis. 572, 28 L. R. A. 405, it was held that the insured is not required to enter into a new appraisement or name another appraiser when the appraiser of the company has shown perverse conduct or want of utmost good faith in attempting to obtain an appraisement. In this case the court said, further, that it was not permissible for the insurers to arbitrarily or capriciously demand an appraisal (before an effort to settle and an honest difference has arisen) simply to suspend a claim for loss, and then select an appraiser who will perversely refuse to concur in an umpire unless he comes from Chicago or is the kind of a man the insurers want. Such a course, if tolerated, places the assured very largely at the mercy of the insurer. Any attempt on the part of either party to misuse or pervert the provisions of the policy as to an appraisal, so as to unreasonably delay an adjustment, or to secure an unjust abatement of an honest loss, is a breach of good faith, and should be treated as a waiver of the condition, and dispensing with the necessity of an appraisal, or warranting a resort to an action without one, if the party thus prejudiced has used all fair and reasonable means and diligence on his part to secure it. To hold otherwise would be to permit the party in fault to profit by his own wrong. The arbitration having failed in consequence of the perverse conduct and want of good faith of the insurance companies represented by their adjuster and appraiser, the plaintiff was not bound to enter into a new one, or name another appraiser, even if the companies were willing to name a new one on their part. Citing, also, Uhrig v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 362; Davenport v. Lond Island Ins. Co. 10 Daly, 538, 539. See also 2 Biddle on Insurance, § 1162, where it is said: "Where each side duly selects an arbitrator, but the umpire fails of selection, it is said there need not be a new arbitration proceeding;" citing the case in 101 N. Y. 362.

We are satisfied that the action of the appraiser for the companies in this case was arbitrary, and his demands unreasonable, and the appraiser of the insured was not bound to submit to them; nor, under the facts disclosed in this record, was the insured bound to submit, in the first instance, to an arbitration, or proceed further in an attempt at appraisal after the effort made; and they were justified in bringing their suit when they did.

The only other question which we think it material to consider is whether the verdict or judgment in this case is excessive or not supported by the evidence. The matter was submitted to a jury, and they have passed upon this question as best they could, and there is certainly evidence to support their finding. It is said that there is a discrepancy between the amounts stated in the proof of loss and the evidence given by the same parties. This is explained by the assured with a statement that the proofs of loss were intended to be only approximate, and to show actual cost of the material in the yard, while the evidence showed its actual market value at the same place, which latter statement shows the actual loss estimated by market value, while the proof of loss shows the same estimated by actual cost made out as suggested by the companies. The plaintiffs are, we think, entitled to the market value of their property destroyed so far as covered by their policies. The three-fourth value clauses in the policies sued on in this cause have been held to be inoperative under our statute (Dugger v. Mechanics & T. Ins. Co. 95 Tenn. 245, 28 L. R. A. 796), and the plaintiff is not restricted to that amount of recovery.

We see no error in the judgment of the court below, and it is affirmed with costs.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

SUCCESSION OF Amelie RIXNER
On Opposition of
THE CHARITY HOSPITAL, Appt.

(48 La. Ann. 552.)

1. A citizen and subject of Italy is exempt from the payment of the 10 per centum tax levied against foreign heirs, on property situated in this state, under act 130 of 1894, the title to which is derived by testamentary disposition of his mother's will, she having likewise been a citizen of Italy at the date of her death.

2. The "most favored nation" clause of the treaty between Italy and the United States entitles citizens and subjects of the former to the same tax exemptions as the citizens and subjects of the latter are, and the same right to acquire and dispose of personal and real property within the territory of the latter, by donation, testament, or otherwise, from or to aliens and subjects of the former.

3. It is both wise and conservative for courts to adhere to what has been repeatedly adjudged; and, when the intent and meaning of a law have been settled by the uniform and consistent course of judicial construction, the construction becomes, in so far as contract and treaty rights acquired thereunder are concerned, as much a part of the law as the text itself.

*Headnotes by WATKINS, J.

(February 10, 1896.)

APPEAL by opponent from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division C., dismissing its claim to a tax on money in the hands of the executors of the estate of Amelie Rixner, deceased, on the ground that the property was left to foreign legatees. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Branch K. Miller for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Claiborne, for appellee:

In enacting or re-enacting without change a statute which has been the subject of judicial interpretation, the legislature, it is to be presumed, intended it to continue to receive the same interpretation and produce the same effect.

I. General doctrine respecting treaties.

There are numerous decisions regarding the construction of treaties, but, restricting them to cases wherein the rights of aliens to inherit have arisen, the following general principles are deducible therefrom.

The United States has power to make treaties removing the disability of aliens to inherit, and such treaties are a valid exercise of and within the powers conferred by the Constitution of the United States. People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 381.

In Droit d' Aubaine, 8 Ops. Atty. Gen. 411, it was stated that the United States government had the constitutional power to enter into treaty stipulations with foreign governments, for the purpose of restricting or abolishing the property disabilities of aliens or their heirs in the several states of the Union.

In the United States a treaty is something more than a contract, for the reason that the Federal Constitution declares it to be the law of the land, and therefore, before it can become a law, the Senate, in whom rests the authority to ratify it, must agree to it; but they are not required to adopt it or reject it as a whole, but may modify or amend it. Jecker v. Magee, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 32, 19 L. ed. 571.

Article 6 of the Federal Constitution provides: "All treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84.

When a treaty made by the proper Federal authorities has been ratified, it becomes the law of the land, and the courts have no power to question it, or in any manner to look into the powers or rights of the nation or tribe with which it is made, the action of the treaty-making power being exclusive upon such inquiry. Maiden v. Ingersoll, 6 Mich. 373; Rabasse's Succession, 47 La. Ann. 1452.

And if such a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive as to the rights that may be claimed under it and the other liberal, the latter must be preferred. Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 25 L. ed. 628.

Every treaty made by the authority of the United States is superior to the Constitution and laws of any individual state, and if the law of the state is contrary thereto, it is void. Ibid.; Watson v. Donnelly, 28 Barb. 653.

And the state law must yield. Yeaker v. Yeaker, 4 Met. (Ky.) 33, 81 Am. Dec. 530, 534.

But when a state law is deemed unconstitutional because opposed to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the Federal government, it is only void so far as it contravenes the Constitution, laws, and treaties. Ibid.

v. Lastrapes, 13 La. Ann. 582; Armant's Succession, 43 La. Ann. 310; State, Da Ponte, v. Board of Assessors, 35 La. It is important to adhere to what has already been decided. The judicial interpretation becomes, as it were, a part of the statute, and should not be changed but for the most urgent reasons.

Upon the construction of the Constitution

The termination of a treaty by war does not devest the right of property already vested under it. Fiott v. Com. 12 Gratt. 564. Society for Prop. of Gospel v. New Haven, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 464, 5 L. ed. 662, and Fox v. Southack, 12 Mass. 143, to the same effect.

In construing the 6th article of the Federal Constitution it has been held that provisions in regard to the transfer, devise, or inheritance of property are fitting subjects of negotiation and regulation of the treaty-making power of the United States, and that a treaty will control or suspend the statutes of the individual states whenever it diverts from them, and for that reason, if the citizen or subject of a foreign government is disqualified under the laws of a state from taking, holding, or transferring real property, such disqualification will be removed if a treaty between the United States and such foreign government confers the right to take, hold, or transfer real property. Wunderle v. Wunderle, supra.

In United States v. Lariviere, 93 U. S. 198, 23 L. ed. 848, it was stated that if a treaty to which the United States was a party removed the disability of an alien, and secured to him the right to take and hold real estate by descent or devise, as if he were a native of this country, it might contravene the statutes of a state, but in that event the courts would disregard them and give to the alien the further protection conferred by the provisions of the treaty.

But it has been doubted whether the Federal government has authority, in virtue of the treaty-making power, and therefore whether it could have intended to interfere with the laws of descent in relation to real property in the several states, in making a treaty with any foreign government involving the right of nonresident aliens to acquire and hold lands by descent. Jost v. Jost, 1 Mackey, 487.

In that case, however, the court stated that, with respect to the power of the Federal government on that subject, it was sufficient to say that whatever might be thought of it as affecting property in the states, there was no question about it in the District of Columbia; and it was therefore held that by virtue of the Maryland act of descent, in force in the District of Columbia, and the treaty with Switzerland, the nonresident alien heirs, brothers and sisters of the deceased, took equally with his brother who was a resident of the United States. Ibid.

The treaty, however, which will suspend or override the state statute, must be a treaty between the United States and the government of the particular country of which the alien claiming to be relieved of the disability imposed by the state law is a citizen or subject; therefore, a treaty with some other country of which such alien is not a citizen or a subject cannot have the effect of removing the disability complained of. Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84.

As the individual citizen, on whose right of property a treaty may operate, has no means of knowing anything of it while before the Senate, he cannot in principle be held bound by it as a law of the land, until it is ratified and proclaimed. And to construe the law so as to make the ratification of the treaty relate back to its signing, thereby devesting a title already vested, would be manifestly unjust. Jecker v. Magee, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 32, 19 L. ed. 571.

In order to ascertain whether a title is within the protection afforded by the treaty, there must be an inquiry into the existence and structure of the title, before the court can construe the treaty in reference to the title. Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 304, 358, 4 L. ed. 97, 110.

But in Hughes v. Edwards, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. ed. 142, decided under the treaty with Great Britain of 1794, it was held not to be necessary for an alien to show that he was in actual possession or seisin at the date of the treaty, which applied to the title whatever that might be, and gave it the same legal validity as if the parties were citizens.

It is a principle of international law that, as respects the rights of either government under it, a treaty is considered as concluding and binding from the date of its signature, and in this regard the exchange of ratification has a retroactive effect confirming the treaty from its date; but a different rule prevails when the treaty operates on individual rights. The principles of relation not applying to rights of this character, which were vested before the treaty was ratified, and in so far as it affects them, it is not considered as concluded until there is an exchange of ratification. Jecker v. Magee, and laws of a state the Supreme Court of the United States as a general rule follows the decisions of her highest court unless they conflict with or impair the efficacy of some provision of the Federal Constitution or of a Federal statute or a rule of general commercial law.

Mr. Henry Denis, amicus curiæ.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The opponent claims 10 per centum on whatever amount shall be due on decedent's account to Ignazio Vincanzo de Sarzana, the heir instituted under a will; said heir being domiciliated in Marcella, and a citizen and subject of the Kingdom of Italy, and the succession of the testatrix being administered in the parish of Orleans, La. The opposition was, after due proceedings and trial, dismissed, and the executor's account approved and homologated, and the opponent has appealed.

In the lower court the case was tried and decided upon an agreed statement of facts, the purport of which is as follows, viz.:

(1) That the universal legatee under the will of Amelie Rixner, Ignazio de Sarzana, is a minor, and not domiciliated in, or a citizen of, the state of Louisiana, or of the United States of America.

(2) That he is a citizen and subject of the Kingdom of Italy, wherein he now resides, and where he has always resided and has his domicil.

(3) That the property proposed for distribution on the account that is opposed consists of the following, viz.:

Immovables valued at	$70,100 00
Movables valued at	574 23

supra; Yeaker v. Yeaker, 4 Met. (Ky.) 33, 81 Am. Dec. 530, 534.

Where a treaty gives foreigners three years in which to claim real estate by devise or descent, and to dispose thereof, the right must be exercised within such period, for the reason that the state legislature is not forbidden to deny the right after such period, such a state law being so far affected by the treaty as to become inoperative for that period, but no further. Yeaker v. Yeaker, supra.

Under § 1998 of the Tennessee Code, an alien may take and hold real estate in that state by purchase, inheritance, or in any other way which may be agreed upon by treaty between the United States and the country of which he is a citizen or subject. The court held, in considering the above section of the Code, that if the law contravened the treaty the latter must prevail, the treaty being the supreme law on the subject, and that when a right grows out of, or is protected by, a treaty, it is sanctioned against all the laws and judicial decisions of the state, and whoever has this right is to be protected. Baker v. Shy, 9 Heisk. 85, 89.

II. Great Britain.

The capacity of private individuals, British subjects, or of corporations created by the Crown, in the United States or in Great Britain, to hold lands or other property in the United States, was not affected by the Revolution. Society for Prop. of Gospel v. New Haven, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 464, 5 L. ed. 662.

In Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. ed. 666, it was held that the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain of 1783, acted upon the state of things as it existed at that time and took the actual state of things as its basis, and all those, whether natives or otherwise, who then adhered to the American states, were virtually absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown; and all those who then adhered to the British Crown were deemed and held subjects of that Crown, the treaty being a treaty operating between states and the inhabitants thereof, the court reversing the decision in the court below in the case of Ex parte Dupont, 1 Harp. Eq. 5.

Upon the above holding, therefore, all British-born subjects, whose allegiance Great Britain has never renounced, ought, upon general principles of interpretation, to be held within the intent, as they certainly are within the words, of the treaty of 1794. Shanks v. Dupont, supra.

The 6th article of the treaty of peace of 1783 between the United States and Great Britain protects the property of British corporations and of natural persons; and their title is confirmed by the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, between the same governments, so that it cannot be forfeited by any intermediate legislative act, or other proceeding for the defect of alienage. Society for Prop. of Gospel v. New Haven, supra.

And the treaty of 1794, which enabled the subjects of either power to hold land within the territory of the other, was not annulled by a posterior war between the contracting parties. Fox v. Southack, 12 Mass. 143.

So, the stipulations contained in the treaty of 1794, for the protection of the rights of property, imposed no new obligation upon the government of the United States, but only affirmed the law of nations. May v. Specht, 1 Mich. 187.

And the 9th article of such treaty applies to vested remainders as well as to estates in possession. Fox v. Southack, supra.

A person born a British subject, who in 1772, became a resident of the United States, and remained such until after the treaty of 1794, was held to be protected in his right to hold lands. Trimble v. Harrison, 1 B. Mon. 140.

But the treaty secures no privilege to the alien heirs of American citizens, and therefore lands of citizens of the United States do not descend to an alien child. Ibid.

And this is so for the reason that such treaties had for their object the security of British subjects in the disposition of their real estate, and had not in view any privilege of aliens to succeed as heirs to the estates of American citizens. Love v. Hadden, 3 Brev. 1; Ennas v. Franklin, 2 Brev. 398.

So, the treaty of November, 1794, relates only to lands then held by British subjects, and not to any after-acquired lands. Jackson, Johnston, v. Decker, 11 Johns. 418, 422.

And it only protects titles held by British subjects at the date thereof. Trimble v. Harrison, 1 B. Mon. 140; Marshall v. Conrad, 5 Call (Va.) 364.

For this reason, therefore, as to such lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, neither such

(4) That Joseph de Sarzana is the father and tutor of said minor, and Jules Andrieu, of the city of New Orleans, La., is the agent and attorney in fact of the said tutor.

(5) That the treaties between Italy and other nations and the United States are contained in the volume which is entitled "Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers," and same is to be used in the original for all the purposes of this case. The volume referred to is produced in the original as constituting part of the transcript.

Opponent propounds its claim under and in pursuance of the terms and provisions of act 130 of the general assembly of the state of Louisiana, approved on the 11th of July, 1894; and it claims that under said act "every person not domiciled in this state, and not being a citizen of any state or territory of the Union, who shall be entitled, whether as heir, legatee, or donee, to the whole or any part of the succession of a person deceased, whether such person shall have died in this state or elsewhere, shall pay a tax for the benefit of the Charity Hospital of 10 per cent on all sums due, on the value of all property which may have actually been received from said succession, or so much thereof as is situated in this state, after deducting all debts due by the said succession;" that it is made the duty of the executor, curator, etc., having charge of the administration of the succession property belonging to a person residing out of the state, "to retain in his hands the amount of the tax imposed, and pay the same over to the treasurer of the Charity Hospital," etc. He demands that the executor of the estate of the deceased comply with the law, and pay over to the said administrators 10 per centum of the net value thereof. The executor resists opponent's demand, and says that he is protected from making the payment demanded, and against the provisions of said law, "by the clauses of the treaty between Italy and the United States concluded, ratified, and proclaimed in the year 1871, and especially by article 22 thereof, which provides: 'The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament, or otherwise; and their representatives, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their personal goods, subjects nor their heirs are to be regarded as aliens, the treaty protecting the title giving it the same validity as if in the hands of a citizen. Trimble v. Harrison, supra.

And for the further reason that such treaty of peace does not give title. Blight v. Rochester, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 535, 5 L. ed. 516.

So that no claim to lands can be established in virtue of either of the treaties of 1783 or 1794 where the claimant is unable to show a title in himself or his ancestor at the time the treaty was made. Orser v. Hoag, 3 Hill, 79; Harden v. Fisher, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 300, 4 L. ed. 96; Orr v. Hodgson, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L. ed. 613; Blight v. Rochester, supra.

Thus, where an alien British subject came to the United States subsequent to the treaty of 1783, and before the signing of the treaty of 1794 died seised of real estate, it was held that his title was not protected in favor of the heirs by such treaties. Blight v. Rochester, supra.

The effect of the 6th article of the treaty of peace of 1783 was not only to bar the escheat of lands held by British subjects, but to give them a capacity to transmit the same by descent; but such descent must be, as in ordinary cases, to a citizen not an alien, although there might be an exception where the land was owned by a subject of the British Crown at the commencement of the Revolutionary war, and the alien, claiming to take as heir, was then in life. Brown v. Sprague, 5 Denio, 545.

In that case title to real estate was acquired in 1769, by a subject of the British Crown who died in 1788 or 1789, intestate leaving nonresident aliens, a nephew and a niece, his only heirs. And the court held that such nephew and niece were incapable of acquiring title on account of their alienage, and therefore had no right to pass such title on the decease of their uncle by deed, the treaty of 1794 having no possible bearing on the case, inasmuch as the title to the land was not then vested in any British subject.

With regard to the effect of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, in the case of Jackson v. Burns, 3 Binn. 75, 82, where a British antenatus sought to inherit lands in Pennsylvania in 1810, the court followed the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Dawson v. Godfrey, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 321, 2 L. ed. 634, wherein a nonresident alien, who was never in the United States, was held incapable of inheriting from a citizen of the United States.

The 6th article of the treaty of the year 1783 merely provides against future confiscations and prosecutions for the conduct of those who took part in the war, and the 9th article of the treaty of 1794 secured to British subjects then holding lands in the United States the right to hold and enjoy the same, and the right to dispose thereof by sale or devise, and extended to their heirs and assigns the same legal remedies which would be incident to such lands if the same were held and claimed by American citizens; but such treaty could not be considered to intend "a restoration of all individuals to the same condition they were in before the war as far as existing circumstances would permit," and therefore they could not restore inheritable blood, nor allow aliens to succeed as heirs, to the estate of an American citizen. Trezevant v. Osborn, 3 Brev. 29. Dawson v. Godfrey, supra, followed.

And it has been held that such article completely protects the title of British subjects to lands in the United States, which would have been liable to forfeiture by escheat for the defect of alienage, and was not meant to be confined to confiscations jure belli. Orr v. Hodgson, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 453, 4 L. ed. 613.

The 9th article of the treaty of 1794 applies to the title of the parties, and gives it the same legal validity as if the parties were citizens; and it is not necessary that they should show actual possession or seisin, but only that the title should be in them at the time the treaty was made, the treaty not meaning to include any other persons than such as were British subjects or citizens of the United States. Ibid.

In Craig v. Radford, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 594, 4 L. ed. 467, it was held that a defeasible title, which vested during the Revolutionary war in a British subject who was never a citizen of the United States, was completely protected and confirmed by the 9th article of the treaty of 1794.

Two nonresident alien brothers of a British subject who had become a naturalized citizen of the United States, and died intestate in 1805, leaving no kindred who were citizens, were held incawhether by testament, or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves, or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country wherein such goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases. As for the case of real estate the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties shall be treated on the footing of the most favored nation.'" His averment is that this court, in placing an interpretation upon similar rights of French citizens and the subjects of Bavaria, held that they were protected against the operation and effect of similar statutes under and by virtue of treaties existing between the United States and France and Bavaria, respectively, and that the legatee of Mrs. Amelie Rixner ought to be afforded like protection by the treaty above cited and relied upon; that, in so far as the statute upon which opponent relies is opposed to, or comes in conflict with, said treaty stipulation, same is null and inoperative, as in contravention of § 2 of art. 6 of the Constitution of the United States, viz.: "This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

Counsel for opponent has employed substantially the language of the legislative act which is relied upon for the enforcement of the tax demanded (act 130 of 1894). It purports to be a revival of the provisions of §§ 1221-1223 of the Revised Civil Code, relative to the tax due by foreign heirs, which was repealed by act 86 of 1877, and also to amend the same. The act of 1877 merely repealed, in terms, the sections of the Civil Code referred to, and corresponding provisions of the Revised Statutes. A careful comparison instituted between the provisions of the articles of the Civil Code and the statute of 1894, above referred to, discloses that the institution of the Charity Hospital as the beneficiary, in lieu of the state, is the only difference between them. These articles have no counterpart in the Code Napoleon, and were for the first time introduced into our own Code in its revision in 1870, being the codification of § 7 of act 315 of 1855.

pable of taking by descent. Trezevant v. Osborn, supra.

And where the right of a nonresident alien widow was not vested either at the time of the Revolution, nor at the date of either of those treaties, it was held to be independent of them and therefore her right to dower was barred except as to those lands of which her husband was seised before the American Revolution. Kelly v. Harrison, 2 Johns. Cas. 29.

But in Den, Fisher, v. Harnden, 1 Paine, C. C. 55, it was held that the alienage of the plaintiff in an ejectment action could not be set up to defeat a recovery, where the ancestor held the land at the time of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, of 1794.

Alien heirs may take by inheritance from alien ancestors, who hold lands under the protection of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. Munro v. Merchant, 28 N. Y. 9, 39. Jackson, Folliard, v. Wright, 4 Johns. 75, to the same effect.

And the same principle was assumed in the action of Orser v. Hoag, 3 Hill, 79, although in that case the title of the alien heir did not prevail, because the ancestor died before the treaty was signed, and therefore he was not within its influence.

But the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain of 1783 did not revest estates which had been forfeited to the state by acts of attainder passed prior to the treaty, and therefore such estates were not devested from the state. McGregor v. Comstock, 16 Barb. 427, 434.

And this, for the reason that the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain of 1783 referred only to future confiscations, and had no reference to attainders and forfeitures which had already become complete and absolute. Ibid.

So, the treaty entered into in the year 1846 between the United States and Great Britain in no way disposed of the soil or embarrassed the right of eminent domain. Cowenia v. Hannah, 3 Or. 465.

But the provisions of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States in the year 1794 did not affect the disability of a British subject who was an alien enemy. Hutchinson v. Brock, 11 Mass. 119.

A person born in America before the Declaration of Independence would have a right to hold lands in England, for the reason that he once owed allegiance to that government, and although a severance of the United States from England might release him from his allegiance, yet it could not deprive him of his rights; but a person born in England before that period could have no pretense to citizenship in the United States on that account, his situation being totally different, as he never owed allegiance to the United States government, and never was a citizen thereof. Hebron v. Colchester, 5 Day, 169, 171.

Therefore, a British subject born before the Revolution could not inherit lands under the terms of the treaty of 1794. Read v. Read, 5 Call (Va.) 160.

In Fiott v. Com. 12 Gratt. 564, where the ancestor acquired the estate by purchase in 1793, it was held that an alien could take by purchase, and that the conveyance clothed him with the title, and that, no inquest or office found having devested him of the title before his death, such title thus vested in him was confirmed by the 9th article of 1794, and therefore upon his death in 1818, such lands descended to his children and heirs, the war of 1812 not having devested his rights.

Where, in the year 1782, a testator devised real estate to his two alien daughters, it was held that they took subject to the will, but even if bound to take by descent they were protected by the treaty of 1794, article 9 of which declares that British subjects should hold as before the war. Duncan v. Beard, 2 Nott & McC. 400.

A British subject was held entitled to real estate of which her daughter died seised without husband, or children, or father, under the treaty of 1794, and the South Carolina act of 1791, in Megrath v. Robertson, 1 Desauss. Eq. 445, 449.

Where one residing in Pennsylvania before the Declaration of Independence had a son born there before such period, and in 1783 went to England to recover compensation for losses as an American loyalist, and returned to Pennsylvania in 1785, where he died, the son never having been in England, it was held they were both to be taken as American subjects, and therefore could only claim lands in England under the statute 37 Geo. III., chap. 97, § 24. Doe, Stansbury, v. Arkwright, 5 Car. & P. 575.

Where a British subject entitled to citizenship

Counsel for the executor has accurately quoted the language of the treaty of the United States with Italy. Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers, pp. 581-587, art. 22. As it appears from the agreed statement of facts that the decedent's succession exclusively consists of real estate, it is manifest that the executor chiefly relies on that clause of the treaty with Italy which declares that "as for real estate the citizens and subjects of the two contracting parties shall be treated on the footing of the most favored nation." Therefore an examination of the provisions of some of the treaties which the United States have made is important.

The following is an extract from the treaty which was concluded between the President of the United States and the Emperor of the French, and proclaimed on the 12th of August, 1853, viz.: "Art. 7. In all the states of the Union, whose existing laws permit it, so long and to the same extent as the said laws shall remain in force, Frenchmen shall enjoy the right of possessing personal and real property by the same title and in the same manner as the citizens of the United States. They shall be free to dispose of it as they may please, either gratuitously or for value received, by donation, testament, or otherwise, just as those citizens themselves; and in no case shall they be subjected to taxes on transfer, inheritance, or any others, different from those paid by the latter, or to taxes which shall not be equally imposed." Treaties and Conventions, p. 352. The first sentence has exclusive reference to the right of Frenchmen to "enjoy the right of possessing personal and real property by the same title, and in the same manner as the citizens of the United States;" and the second declares that "Frenchmen shall be free to dispose of their property as they may please," and "in no case shall they be subjected to taxes on transfer, inheritance, or any others, different from those paid by the latter, or to taxes which shall not be equally imposed." It is with the latter that we are alone concerned, as no question has been raised with reference to the right of Frenchmen to acquire and hold property in any of the states of the Union, and to that alone does the language of the treaty refer.

by virtue of the treaty of 1794, had a child also a British subject, who removed to England and there, when of full age married a British subject and permanently settled there, it was held upon the death of the father that such child could not take lands by descent from the father in Kentucky, as it had elected to adhere to Britain, and was therefore an alien, and that no title passed by the deed of an alien claiming by descent through a father who was a citizen, to lands in Kentucky. Trimble v. Harrison, 1 B. Mon. 140.

In Jackson, Folliard, v. Wright, 4 Johns. 75, a native of Ireland emigrated to the United States in 1778, purchased real estate in 1784, and died in 1798 without issue, leaving a brother and three sisters, nonresident aliens, him surviving. The real estate was, by the act of the legislature of 1804, vested in one of the sisters, who had married an alien, in like manner as if she had been a citizen at the time of the death of the deceased. Subsequently an action of ejectment was brought by one claiming a moiety pursuant to an award of the county commissioners. It was held that the deceased, having emigrated to the United States after the Declaration of Independence, was to be considered as an alien, and that the land so held by him was by the 9th article of the treaty of 1794 vested in him and his heirs, although they were aliens, and that the act of the legislature of 1804, which gave the whole of such estate to the sister, one of his four heirs, to the exclusion of the rest, was contrary to the treaty and inoperative, but that the heirs, having entered no dissent to the award of the commissioners within the time limited by the act, were barred and concluded thereby, except one of the sisters who was a married woman and therefore within the saving clause of the act.

In Forsyth v. Reynolds, 56 U. S. 15 How. 358, 14 L. ed. 729, it was held that lands granted to settlers in Michigan prior to the surrender of the western coast by the British government, which grants were made to carry out the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 1794, were not donations so as to exclude the settler in Peoria from the benefit of the two acts of Congress passed in the year 1820 and 1823, by which acts Congress granted a lot in the village of Peoria, Illinois, to each settler who "had not heretofore received a confirmation of claim or donation of any tract of land or village lot from the United States."

In the above case the plaintiff claimed one portion of the estate as heir to his father, and the other portion by purchase from the other heirs of his father.

In Shanks v. Dupont, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 242, 7 L. ed. 666, a native of South Carolina died intestate in the year 1782, seised of land on St. James' Island, leaving two daughters both born in the states before the Declaration of Independence. One daughter married a citizen of South Carolina and died in 1802, entitled to one half the estate. In the year 1780, the British took possession of the island; and the other daughter of the intestate married an officer in the British army, and in 1782, went to England where she died in 1801, leaving five children, all born in England, who claimed the other moiety of the estate in right of their mother under the 9th article of the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain of November, 1794, and it was held they were entitled to recover and hold the same.

In Apthorp v. Backus, Kirby (Conn.) 407, 1 Am. Dec. 26, a minor sued by her guardian and next friend, to recover possession of property derived by her by inheritance from her father an alien who purchased in the year 1768, and died in the year 1773, seised in his own right in fee, and the court held that, her title to the land having accrued while she was not an alien, such title could not be affected by the disability of an alien, as she was as much a citizen of the state as any person then within it, her descent being cast under its law; and further that her title was secured by the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, the case not being affected by the subsequent statutes of that state declaring aliens incapable of purchasing or holding lands therein, the proviso to the statute declaring "that the act shall not be construed to work a forfeiture of any lands which belong to any subjects of the King of Great Britain before the late war, or prevent proprietors of such lands from selling and disposing of the same to any inhabitant of any of the United States."

Under the treaty between Great Britain and the United States in 1794, and the English statute of 37 Geo. III., chap. 97, American citizens holding lands in Great Britain on the 29th of October, 1795, and their heirs and assigns, are to be considered, so far as regards such lands, not as aliens, but as native subjects of Great Britain. Sutton v. Sutton, 1 Russ. & M. 633.

In Sutton v. Sutton, supra, it was held that under

The treaty of Bavaria is as follows (Treaties and Conventions, p. 46): "Art. 3. The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their real and personal property within the states of the other by testament, donation, or otherwise; and their heirs, legatees, and donees being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party shall succeed to their said [real and] personal property, and may take possession thereof either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their pleasure, paying such duty only as the inhabitants of the country where the said property lies shall be liable to pay in like cases." The foregoing is an extract from the treaty which was concluded between the United States and the King of Bavaria, and proclaimed on August 16, 1846. Treaties and Conventions, p. 46.

The Spanish treaty provides as follows, viz.: "Art. 2. The citizens and subjects of each party shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their representatives being subjects or citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof, either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the said goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases." The foregoing is an extract from the treaty which was concluded between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, and proclaimed on August 2, 1796. Treaties and Conventions, p. 1009.

The German treaty provides as follows, viz.: "Art. 10, § 3. In all successions to inheritances, citizens of each of the contracting parties shall pay in the country of the other such duties only as they would be liable to pay, if they were citizens of the country in which the property is situated or the judicial administration of the same may be exercised." The foregoing is an extract from the treaty which was concluded between the United States and the German Empire, and proclaimed June 1, 1872. Treaties and Conventions, p. 366.

The treaty with Great Britain provides as follows, viz.: "Art. 9. It is agreed that British the treaty of 1794, and the statute 37 Geo. II., chap. 97, American citizens who held lands in Great Britain on the 28th of October, 1795, and their heirs and assigns, were at all times to be considered, so far as regarded those lands, not as aliens, but as native subjects of Great Britain.

In Countess Conway's Case, 2 Knapp, P. C. 364, it was held that the foreign wife of a British subject was not entitled to compensation for the loss of her separate property, under a treaty providing such a compensation for British subjects, unless she had herself acquired a domicil in Great Britain at the time of her loss; and further that a foreigner domiciled in Great Britain was, under such a treaty, entitled to claim compensation for his losses.

In Doe, Thomas, v. Acklam, 4 Dowl. & R. 394, 2 Barn. & C. 779, it was held that a person born in the United States since the treaty of 1783, by which those states were acknowledged to be free, sovereign, and independent, was an alien and could not take lands by descent in England.

Persons born in the United States of America since the treaty of 1783 are aliens, and cannot take lands by descent or inherit them in England. Ibid.

III. France.

In Rabasse's Succession, 47 La. Ann. 1452, the question was the right of French subjects to be represented in the United States by the consul of their country, and the court held that upon that subject the treaty between the United States and France was plain in its provisions, and by the organic law it was the supreme law of the land, and binding upon all courts whether state or Federal under art. 6, ¶ 2, of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore the consul, and not an attorney appointed by the court, was the proper party to represent the absent heirs.

In Schaffer's Succession, 13 La. Ann. 113, the treaty between the United States and France suspending the state law imposing a tax of 10 per cent on successions falling to foreign heirs, stipulated that "from the day of the exchange of the ratification, which shall be made in conformity with the respective Constitutions of the two countries and exchanged at Washington within the period of six months or sooner if possible," was held not to take effect until after its ratification, and that such ratification had no retrospective effect, and therefore did not relate back to, or affect, a succession prior to the date of such ratification, and therefore the heirs were subjected to the tax.

In Amat's Succession, 18 La. Ann. 403, it was held that the laws of Louisiana permitted Frenchmen to enjoy the rights of possessing and owning property in that state; and further that under the treaty of 1853, they could not be subjected to taxes on transfers, inheritance, or any others, different from those paid by the citizens of the state, or to taxes which were not equally imposed.

The provision in the French treaty referred to in the above case was article 7, which provides: "In all the states of the Union whose laws permit it, so long and to the same extent, as the said law shall remain in force, Frenchmen shall enjoy the right of possessing personal and real property by the same title, and in the same manner, as the citizens of the United States. They shall be free to dispose of it as they may please, either gratuitously or for value received, by donation, testament, or otherwise, just as though citizens themselves, and in no case shall they be subjected to taxes on transfers, inheritance, or any others, different from those paid by the latter, or taxes which shall not be equally imposed."

But in Prevost's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 577, Affirmed 60 U.S. 19 How. 1, 15 L. ed. 572, it was held that under the above treaty the succession of a French citizen who died prior thereto would not exempt his heirs residing in France from the operation of the Louisiana act of 1842, which imposed a tax of 10 per cent on successions falling to foreigners, even though the words of the treaty imported such an intention.

The stipulation as to property in the treaty of cession of Louisiana by France to the United States embraces all titles to land whether legal or equitable, perfect, or imperfect. Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S. 412, 28 L. ed. 321.

The term "property," in the treaty by which the United States acquired Louisiana, comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete, legal or equitable, and embraces rights which lie in contract executory as well as executed. Bryan v. Kennett, 113 U. S. 179, 28 L. ed. 908.

In Carneal v. Banks, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 181, 6 L. ed. 297, it was held that the treaty between the United States and France, passed in the year 1778 subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States; and American citizens who now hold lands in the dominion of His Majesty, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein, and may grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they please, in like manner as if they were natives; and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns shall, so far as may respect the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens." The foregoing is an extract from the treaty which was concluded between the United States and his Britannic majesty, and proclaimed on the 29th of February, 1796. Treaties and Conventions, p. 385.

It will be interesting and instructive to examine and consider the legislation of this state on this subject, and the course of our jurisprudence under it, as auxiliary to our investigation and decision of the question at issue. The first enactment on the subject is act 95 of 1828, § 1 of which declares "that any person who is not a citizen of the United States, or is not domiciliated in any part of said states, shall be subject to pay to this state 10 per cent of all sums which may be due to him as heir, legatee, or donee, by any succession which may be opened in this state." This act was repealed in 1830, and was again re-enacted in 1842; being incorporated in the general revenue law of that year in slightly a tered language. Act 154 of 1842, § 4. The terms employed are "that each and every person not being domiciliated in this state, and not being a citizen of any state or territory in the Union, who shall be entitled," etc. It is again reproduced in the general revenue law of 1850, in the following terms, viz.: "Every executor, curator, tutor, or administrator having charge or administration of succession property, belonging in whole or in part to a person residing out of this state, and not being a citizen of any other state or territory of the United States, shall be bound to retain in his hands the amount of the tax imposed by law," etc. Act 194 of 1850, § 76. As this statute did not repeal former laws, except those on "the subject treated in this act," the language of the section quoted may be regarded as a legislative interpretation of former laws on the subject mentioned. But the identical language which is employed in the statute of 1842 is reproduced, in totidem verbis, in the law of 1855 (§ 7 of act 315 of 1855). In this allowed the citizens of either country to hold lands in the other, and that a title, once vested in a French subject, to hold lands from the United States, was not devested by the abrogation of that treaty, and the expiration of the subsequent convention of 1800.

The stipulations of the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, affording that protection or security to claims under the French or Spanish government to which the act of Congress of May 25, 1824, referred, are contained in the 1st, 2d, and 3d articles of the treaty and extended to all property until Louisiana became a member of the Union, into which the inhabitants were to be incorporated as soon as possible, "and admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States" the perfect inviolability and security of property being among those rights; therefore the right of property is protected and secured by the treaty, and no principle is better settled than that an inchoate title to lands is property. Delassus v. United States, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 117, 9 L. ed. 71.

In the above case it was stated that the right would have been sacred, independent of the treaty, inasmuch as the sovereign who acquires an inhabited country acquires full dominion over it; but such dominion is never supposed to devest the vested rights of individuals; the language of the treaty ceding Louisiana, excluding any idea of interfering with private property.

In that case the heirs claimed under a grant made to their father and the action was brought under the act May 25, 1824, enabling the claimant of lands within the limits of the state of Missouri and territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims.

The convention of 1800, between the United States and France, enabling the people of one country, holding lands in the other, to dispose of the same by testament or otherwise, and to inherit lands in the respective countries without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization, was held to render the performance of the condition a useless formality, and that the conventional rule applied equally to the acts of those who took by descent under the act, as to those who acquired by purchase without its aid. Chirac v. Chirac, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 259, 4 L. ed. 234.

Where the deceased's heirs were French subjects, and claimed at the time the French treaty of 1778 was abrogated, the case turning upon the construction of the Maryland act of 1789, permitting the lands of a French subject, who had become a citizen of Maryland, dying intestate, to descend on the next of kin being unnaturalized Frenchmen, with a proviso, vesting the land in the state if the French heirs should not, within ten years, become resident citizens of the state, or convey the lands to a citizen, it was held that, the time of the performance of the condition having expired before action brought, the estate was terminated unless supported in some other way by the Maryland act. Ibid.

In Chirac v. Chirac, supra, a Frenchman migrated into the United States in 1793, took the oath of citizenship according to the Maryland act passed in 1779, in September, 1795, and before he became naturalized owned real estate, and died intestate leaving no legitimate relations other than the plaintiffs who were natives and residents of France, as against whom the state, supposing that the lands had escheated, conveyed the same to the natural son of the deceased reserving the rights of all persons claiming by devise or descent from the intestate. The nonresident heirs bringing action in ejectment, it was held that the power of naturalization was exclusively in Congress, but that the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France of 1778, art. 11, enabled the subjects of France to purchase and hold lands in the United States, and therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

With respect to the 7th article of the French treaty of the year 1853, it has been held that the disability of Frenchmen from alienage in disposing of and inheriting real and personal estate was removed; the article declaring that in all the states of the Union by whose laws aliens were permitted to hold real estate, so long as such laws remained in force, Frenchmen were to enjoy the right of possessing personal and real property, by the same title, and in the same manner, as citizens of the United States, and should be free to dispose thereof as they might please, by donation, testament, or condition the law remained until the revision of the Civil Code in 1870. Vide, supra. The same language is preserved in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1221; but, in defining the duties of succession representatives with regard to this tax, the language employed is, "a person residing out of the state, and not being a citizen of any other state or territory." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1222. And in the next section the language is, "persons who are neither residents of this state, nor citizens of any other state or territory." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1223. These articles of the Code, and their corresponding provisions in the Revised Statutes, were repealed in 1877, and there was no law on the subject until the statute of 1894 was enacted. Vide, supra. This act follows the language of the articles of the Code very closely, and it declares the legislative purpose to be to revive the same. Act 130 of 1894. It thus appears that the phraseology of the legislation on the subject has remained practically unaltered since 1842, and that the statute of that year continued uninterruptedly in force until 1877, and there has been no law on the subject since, until 1894.

Taken chronologically, the treaties referred to were proclaimed in the following order of dates, viz.: That of Great Britain on February 29, 1796. That of Spain on August 7, 1796. That of Bavaria on August 16, 1846. That of France on August 12, 1853. That of Italy on November 23, 1871. That of Germany on June 1, 1872. It is readily observable that in the last two there is a change of phraseology, different from the language of our statutes and that of some of the previous treaties; for, in the "most favored nation" clause of the Italian treaty the language employed is, "the citizens and subjects of the two countries," and in the German treaty it is, "citizens of each of the contracting parties." And the language of the Spanish treaty is, "the citizens and subjects of each party," but that of the British treaty is, "British subjects" and "American citizens." The Bavarian treaty employs the phrase, "the citizens or subjects of the contracting parties," while the French treaty says, "Frenchmen shall enjoy the same rights as citizens of the United States."

To relieve our minds of any complexity in the matter, the decisions of this court have come to the rescue in determining the true meaning of "the most favored nation" clause of the Italian treaty, in giving an interpretaotherwise—just as those citizens themselves; but that as to the states by whose existing laws aliens were not permitted to hold real estate, the treaty engaged that the President should recommend to them the passage of such laws as might be necessary for the purpose of conferring that right. De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 33 L. ed. 642, 646.

And with regard to the treaty between the same powers, of the year 1800, the court held that under art. 7, during the continuance of the treaty citizens of France could take property in the District of Columbia by inheritance from citizens of the United States, but that after its expiration that right was limited as provided by the statute and the common law of Maryland, as adopted by Congress on the 27th of February, 1801, until the convention between the United States and France was concluded in February, 1853. Ibid.

The 7th article of the treaty of 1853, between the United States and France was further construed in a case where, at the time the real estate was acquired, the state of Tennessee was one of the states of the Union, "by whose existing laws aliens were permitted to hold real estate" on the terms prescribed in its own enactment; and it was therefore held that the treaty of 1853 had a direct application to the case, and that in construing the law in connection with the treaty, the subjects of France were invested, by the law and the treaty together, with the right to make an indefeasible title, by deed or otherwise, to lands owned by them in the state. Baker v. Shy, 9 Heisk. 85, 89.

IV. Bremen.

Under the treaty between the United States and the Hanseatic of Bremen of December 20, 1827, art. 7, nonresident alien heirs, who were citizens of such Republic, are entitled to sell lands in the United States, which they would inherit except for alienage, and to withdraw the proceeds at any time within three years from the death of the ancestor. Schultze v. Schultze, 144 Ill. 290, 19 L. R. A. 90.

See also IX., infra, Hanseatic.

V. Germany.

The treaty between the United States and the German Empire, made soon after the formation of the latter, merely recognizing existing treaties between the German states, and providing that duties on the succession to inheritances shall be only such as are required of citizens, does not give aliens any right to inherit. Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 19 L. R. A. 84.

In the above case it was claimed that the treaty with Germany, of which Baden forms a part, concluded in the year 1871, contained a stipulation which should be so construed as to remove the disability imposed by the Illinois act of 1887. The treaty in question stipulates (art. 10): "In all successions to an inheritance, citizens of each of the contracting parties shall pay in the country of the other such duties only as they would be liable to pay if they were citizens of the country in which the property is situated, or the judicial administration of the same may be exercised." It was held that the treaty conferred no new rights so far as the power to take, hold, or dispose of lands was concerned, but merely recognized existing treaties theretofore made between the United States and certain German states which became part of the empire when it was formed, and did nothing more than stipulate in regard to the payment of duties in cases where treaties already in existence contained provisions upon the subject of successions to inheritances.

The disabilities imposed upon nonresident aliens in the 1st section of the Illinois act of 1887 were not removed by any existing treaty between the United States and the Grand Duchy of Baden, or between the United States and the German Empire; nor was the disqualification of such nonresident aliens as declared by the said act affected in any way by provisions and treaties between the United States and other governments than those of Baden and the German Empire. Ibid.

VI. Grand Duchy of Hesse.

Where in ejectment plaintiffs claimed as heirs at law and the facts showed that a naturalized citizen of the United States died intestate and seised in the year 1866, leaving no descendants, or father or mother, but two brothers and one sister all unnaturalized aliens; that one brother died in 1866, his right passing to the surviving brother and sister, that plaintiffs were the only relatives by blood; third cousins, all residents of the United States; that under the treaty between the United States and the Grand Duchy of Hesse of the year 1845, non-tion to some other treaties, the effect of which is to subordinate our statutes thereto, and place the citizens and subjects of other countries upon the same plane as the citizens of our own state. As best calculated to present the controverted question in the clearest light, the case of State v. Poydras, 9 La. Ann. 165, which was decided in 1854, may be taken as the initial point in our jurisprudence, as the tax in controversy was laid under the act of 1850; and the court, in the course of its decision, took occasion to attract attention to the fact that the statute embraced "persons residing out of this state," and those, also, "not citizens of any other state or territory of the United States," and said: "From this view of the statute, we conclude that the tax attaches, not only to property falling to alien heirs who are nonresidents, but also to the property falling to citizens of our own state residing abroad. The successions falling to nonresident heirs who are citizens of any other state or territory of the United States than Louisiana are alone exempted from it, and this exemption was probably intended to satisfy the requirements of the 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States." The effect of that decision was that the language of the law of 1850 rendered citizens of Louisiana residing abroad liable to the tax, while exempting therefrom citizens of "any other state" of the Union. At the date when that case arose the French treaty had not been concluded, but it was concluded in the following year. During the year 1855 Dufour's Succession, 19 La. Ann. 391, was decided (Mr. Chief Justice Slidell being the organ of the court, and having been the organ of the court in State v. Poydras, supra); the decedent in that instance having been a Frenchman by birth, while Julian Poydras was one by adoption, and the death of the latter occurred prior to the conclusion of the French trea y, and that of the former two days subsequent thereto,—the heirs in each case having the recognized status of French subjects when the successions were opened, respectively. In the course of their decision the court said "that, by a reasonable and just interpretation of the terms of the [French] treaty, the exemption from taxation for which resident alien heirs were entitled to two years in which to sell the property; that in the year 1868, the surviving brother and sister procured an act of the state legislature releasing all the state's interest to the heirs of such naturalized citizen who would inherit but for their alienage,—it was held that the deed from such brother and sister conveyed a good title and that the plaintiff could not recover. Bollermann v. Blake, 94 N. Y. 624, Affirming 24 Hun, 187.

VII. Guadalupe Hidalgo.

In People v. Folsom, 5 Cal. 375, a naturalized citizen of Mexico died seised of real estate twelve days before the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and his mother and heir, through whom defendant claimed, was not, at the time of his death, a citizen of Mexico or of the United States, but was a subject of Denmark, and never a resident of the United States or Mexico, and it was held that the United States, after the treaty, did not become vested with authority to prosecute any claim for a forfeiture or escheat that had accrued in California to the Mexican government.

In McKinney v. Saviego, 59 U. S. 18 How. 235, 15 L. ed. 365, it was held that the 8th section of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the United States of February, 1848, was inapplicable to persons who, before the Revolution in Texas, had been citizens of Mexico, and who, by that Revolution, had been separated from it, for the reason that the right of property for which such article of the treaty was designed to afford a guarantee was that which at its date belonged to Mexican citizens not established within the territories then seised through the United States.

VIII. Hanover.

In the case of Ford v. Husman, 7 Rich. L. 165, a naturalized citizen died intestate, leaving a widow who was an alien and three nonresident alien sisters. A portion of his estate being claimed by the escheator, it was contended that under a treaty between the United States and the King of Hanover, whose subjects such nonresident alien sisters were, the rights of the sisters of the intestate were protected, and that the shares which would have devolved upon them if they had been citizens were, for a reasonable time, liable to their disposition by sale, but the court did not decide the point for the reason that under the statutes of that state the widow was entitled to the whole, and for the further reason that there had been no escheat.

IX. Hanseatic.

In the case of Siemssen v. Bofer, 6 Cal. 250, a similar treaty to that which existed in the case of People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 381, IV., supra, was involved and existed between the United States and the Hanseatic towns of Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, and it was held that such treaty did not enlarge the rights of nonresident aliens in respect to the inheritance of real estate in that state, such treaty only giving them the right to dispose of it within a given time, they being prevented from inheriting such estate as aliens. See also IV., supra, Bremen.

X. The Netherlands.

Under the treaty between the United States and the Netherlands in the year 1782, the subjects of either country might dispose of their effects by will, and their heirs receive such succession ab intestato, even though not naturalized, the words of the treaty applying to both real and personal estate. University v. Miller, 3 Dev. L. 188.

XI. Spain.

In United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 691, 8 L. ed. 547, it was held that the grant of the King of Spain of lands at Alachua in Florida gave a valid title to the claimants under the grant according to the stipulations of the treaty between the United States and Spain of 1819, the laws of nations, of the United States and of Spain.

By the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Spain to the United States, the same time is allowed to the owners of land granted under the authority of Spain, to fulfil the conditions of their grants after the date of the treaty, as was limited in the grants, the treaty as to native rights being considered as dated at its ratification. United States v. Sibbald, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 313, 9 L. ed. 437.

The 8th article of the treaty of cession of Spain to the United States, relating to the performance of the conditions and grants, is not confined to owners of land by occupancy or residence, but extends to persons who have a legal seisin and possession, in land, by virtue of a grant; and in the situation of the province and the claimants to lands at the time of the cession it is enough that they should show a performance of the condition cy près. Ibid., following United States v. Arredondo, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 745, 749, 8 L. ed. 568, 569.

its 7th section provides applies to this case." And holding the provision of the treaty to have been within the constitutional prerogative of the President, they said it must be "obeyed as supreme; that consequently the statute of Louisiana [1842] has become, pro tanto, inoperative, during the continuance of said treaty." The judgment of the district court, enforcing the provisions of the French treaty, and relieving the French subjects from the payment of the tax, was affirmed. A forcible illustration of the view which was by this court entertained of the provisions of the French treaty is found in Prevost's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 577, which was decided in the year 1857. Referring to the decision in Dufour's Succession, supra, the court said: "The present case, however, differs from that of Dufour in the essential particular that Prevost died many years before the conclusion of the consular convention with France, and the right of the state of Louisiana to this tax consequently attached at a period when French citizens did not enjoy an exemption from the operation of the act of 1842." The court thus completely eliminated from consideration the act of 1850, and affirmed the principle of exemption which was announced in the Dufour Case. Subsequently the Prevost Case was considered by the supreme court, and their opinion will be hereafter considered by us. The principle of the Dufour Case was affirmed in Amat's Succession, 18 La. Ann. 403. In Crusius's Succession, 19 La. Ann. 369 (decided in 1867), the heirs of the resident succession, being citizens of Bavaria, were exempt from the payment of a tax which was levied under the act of 1855, by virtue of the stipulations of the Bavarian treaty of 1846, affirming the Dufour and Amat Cases. The question of the liability of Frenchmen to the payment of a tax levied under the act of 1855 arose in 1878, and was considered in Marquis de Circe's Succession, Manning, Unreported Cases, p. 412, decedent's death having occurred in 1869, in France. The court held that the act of 1855 was a revisory statute, which merely reiterated the provisions of the act of 1842, saying: "It formed a part of that general revisory legislation which has been had periodically in this state. . . . It was simply a

XII. Sweden.

In Thompson's Succession, 9 La. Ann. 96, the petitioner, as vice consul of Sweden and Norway, claimed the right to take the succession out of the hands of the defendant, who was administrator of the deceased, alleging that he had the right under the law of nations, the laws of the United States, and the treaties entered into between the United States and Sweden and Norway. It was held that the right claimed was incompatible with the sovereignty of the state, whose jurisdiction extended over the property of foreigners as well as citizens found within its limits, the disposition of the estates of foreigners having been made the subject of special legislation, and no treaty or law of the United States existed, which, as the paramount law, conferred any such right as claimed, nor was there any principle of the law of nations which entitled the petitioner to call in question the authority of the Louisiana laws on that subject.

XIII. Prussia.

Where the attorney general claimed the real estate of a citizen of Prussia on behalf of the state by way of escheat, as against his absent heirs and the purchaser from them, denying the power of the Federal government to make provision by treaty for the determination of such cases, it was held that such treaties were valid and within the provisions of the United States Constitution. People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 381.

The treaty in question in the above case was that made between the United States and Prussia in the year 1828, art. 14 of which provides: "And when, on the death of any person holding real estate within the territory of the one party, such real estate would by the laws of the land descend on a citizen or subject of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, such citizen or subject shall be allowed a reasonable time to sell the same and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation."

The correctness of the above decision, however, was doubted by the court in the subsequent case of Siemssen v. Bofer, 6 Cal. 250, the court stating that it entertained great doubts of its correctness, for the reason that the treaty-making power could only be coeval with the express grant of power to the Federal government, and could never be extended by implication to the reserved powers of the states, or matters which belong to state sovereignty, or the right which appertains to each state to govern her own domestic concerns, and establish her own police regulations; neither could the exercise of this power on the part of the President and Senate be extended to matters which were the proper subject of congressional legislation, for the reason that it would be virtually transferring the power of legislation from the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, to the President, Senate, and Piamingo, and any other Indian Algerine or other chief, and the court further stated that in its opinion the true rule of interpretation was, that whenever the treaty embraced matters which were the subject of legislation by Congress, it required an act of legislature to carry the treaty into effect, otherwise the House of Representatives was a useless appendage to the political machinery of the government, and powers which were expressly prohibited to Congress or reserved to the states might be exercised through the instrumentality or omnipotence of the treaty-making power.

And in Norris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217, it is stated that the language of the court in the prior case of Siemssen v. Bofer, supra, applied to nonresident aliens claiming by descent as heirs of an intestate.

In Re Beck's Estate, 31 N. Y. S. R. 965, the question involved the distribution of surplus moneys, arising from the sale of intestate's property under foreclosure proceedings. The intestate died in 1886, and letters of administration were granted to the public administrator in 1888, and such surplus was claimed by his brothers and sisters all of whom were citizens of the German Empire, and the contention was that by reason of their alienage they were not entitled to participate in the division of real estate or the surplus moneys arising from the sale thereof. The court held that under the treaty existing between the United States and Prussia, which gave such parties a reasonable time to sell the real estate of a decedent, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempted it from all duties on the part of the government of the respective states, the parties were entitled to their shares of the surplus moneys in question.

XIV. Switzerland.

In Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 25 L. ed. 628, it was held that a citizen of Switzerland, removing to Virginia, must be presumed to continue his original citizenship where there was no proof that he ceased to be a citizen of his national country, and that where such a citizen left real estate in reproduction of the laws of previous years, which had existed long anterior to the date of the [French] treaty. It was not a new enactment," etc., but a reproduction of the statute of 1842. The French heirs were relieved from the payment of the tax on the authority of the Dufour and other cases cited. This was the condition of our law and jurisprudence when, in 1870, the Civil Code was revised, and the provisions of the act of 1842 were incorporated therein as articles 1221–1223. They each continued without alteration until 1877, when those articles were expressly repealed, and so remained until 1894, when the legislature revived them and re-enacted them in terms, and without change in phraseology,—this, notwithstanding no alteration has been made in the treaty rights of citizens of other countries; and no contrary decision of this court has been intermediately rendered.

Under "the most favored nation" clause of the Italian treaty, which was concluded in 1846, the instituted heir of the decedent is entitled to have as favorable a construction put upon his property rights in this state as has been accorded by this court to Frenchmen under the treaty with France, or to the subjects of Bavaria. The intimation of the court in the Poydras Case to the effect that the act of 1850 contemplated that property in this state coming to "citizens of our own state residing abroad" was liable to the tax, has not been followed in any subsequent decision of this court, and that act has not been considered in any subsequent decision of this court. Omitting from consideration the word "other," as it has been eliminated from all statutes since 1850, the citizens of Louisiana alone are dealt with in our law and the adjudications of this court; and they are put upon the same plane, in this regard, as the citizens of other states and countries are by the terms of the treaties. The British treaty employs the terms "British subjects" and "American citizens." That of the Spanish treaty is, "the citizens and subjects of each party." That of Germany is the citizens of "each of the contracting parties." That of Bavaria is same as that of Germany. That of France is, "Frenchmen shall enjoy" the rights enjoyed by "the citizens of the United States." Frederickson v. Louisiana, 64 U. S. 23 How. 447, 16 L. ed. 578. All of these treaties deal with the respective property rights of the citizens of the contracting parties, and not with those of inhabitants merely. Not only is this true of the treaty stipulations respecting French citizens, but the law of France provides that "every child born of a Frenchman in a foreign country is French." Code Nap. 10. "A foreigner shall enjoy in France the same civil rights as are or shall be accorded to Frenchmen by the treaties of that nation to which such foreigner shall belong." Code Nap. 11. The comity existing between the two countries, seems to be perfect and complete.

The petition of the opponent has closely fol-

Virginia, his heirs, who were citizens of Switzerland, had, by virtue of the treaty between the United States and the Swiss confederation of November, 1850, the right to sell such estate and to withdraw the proceeds as permitted by the Virginia laws.

In the above case the court reversed the decision of the court below (28 Gratt. 62) and followed the dissenting opinion by Justice Christian, in which he held that the claimants were the legal heirs of the decedent, and that they were entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, the treaty of 1855 giving the state the power, if it chose to exercise it, of fixing the period within which the right of removal of the proceeds of real estate might be exercised; holding further, that the mere failure of the state to fix the terms could not deprive the parties of rights vested under solemn treaties, which were the supreme law of the land.

By the Maryland act of 1791, "an act concerning the territory of Columbia and the city of Washington," it is provided that any foreigner may, by deed or will hereafter to be made, take and hold lands within that part of said territory which lies within this state, in the same manner as if he were a citizen of this state, and the same lands may be conveyed by him and transmitted to, and be inherited by, his heirs or relations as if he and they were citizens of this state. The court in Jost v. Jost, 1 Mackey, 487, held that the claimants who were nonresident aliens had a right, under the Maryland act and the Swiss treaty, to inherit equally with the heirs who were residents in that state.

The alien provisions in the treaty above referred to were the first and third clause of article 5 of the treaty of 1850, which provide: "The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal property within the jurisdiction of the other by sale, testament, donation, or in any other manner, and their heirs, whether by testament or ab intestato, or their successors, being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to the said property, or inherit it, and they may take possession thereof either by themselves, or by others acting for them: they may dispose of the same as they may think proper, paying no other charges than those to which the inhabitants of the country wherein the said property is situated shall be liable to pay in a similar case. The foregoing provision shall be applicable to real estate within the states of the American Union or within the cantons of the Swiss Confederation, in which foreigners are entitled to hold or inherit real estate.

In that case the court stated that the reason for its decision was that the treaty provided that the heirs in question might inherit or succeed, which was unnecessary if the property was in their own country, the clear intention of the treaty being that a citizen of the one country might dispose of his property in the other, and that at his death his heirs who might be citizens of the other should inherit his personal estate wherever it might be; and the term "said property" meant "said personal property" without the limitation of being within the jurisdiction of the other party, the third clause extending the provision to real estate in states of the Union in which aliens might be entitled to hold or inherit real estate.

A naturalized brother and several sisters, and the descendants of others who were resident citizens of Switzerland, claimed as heirs at law of a naturalized citizen, and the question was, whether the treaty between the United States and Switzerland of 1850, which if valid was as much a part of the law of the land as the common law or statutes, made any change in the rules of the common law. The court held that under such treaty the brothers and sisters and other nonresident alien heirs were entitled to inherit in the same manner as other citizens of the United States. Ibid.

Where the decedent died in 1853, and by the terms of the treaty then in force between the United States and the Swiss Confederation the time lowed the phraseology of the act of 1894, and avers that "every person not domiciliated in this state, and not being a citizen of any state, or territory;" thus including, necessarily, the citizens of Louisiana. The phraseology of the act of 1894 was not accidentally employed by the legislature, but it was manifestly employed with the purpose of keeping our law in line with the provisions of previously existing treaties, and which are "the supreme law of the land." U. S. Const. art. 6, § 2. The act of 1894, reviving the articles of the Code which has been repealed fifteen years previously, could not, in any event, have the effect of breaking the force of the repeated decisions of this court giving an interpretation to the law of 1842, which had been kept uninterruptedly in force until its repeal by the legislature in 1877. The manner in which the treaty rights of all nations have been treated for so great a length of time by the legislature of the state and its highest court is not to be lightly considered.

However, some reference has been made to some decisions of the supreme court, as possessing some features which are antagonistic to this view. One of the cases cited and relied upon is Prevost v. Greenaux, 60 U. S. 19 How. 1, 15 L. ed. 572, in which Prevost's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 577, supra, was reviewed on a writ of error. The court held that the right to tax was completely vested in the state when Prevost died, and was not devested by the treaty subsequently concluded, and that the heirs of the deceased acquired their rights subject to the tax. But the court observed, in affirming the judgment of this court, "that the obligation of the treaty and its operation in the state, after it was made, depend upon the laws of Louisiana," and then added the further observation that the operation of the treaty is "expressly limited" to the states of the Union whose laws permit it, so long, and to the same extent, as those laws shall remain in force, and there is no act of the legislature of Louisiana repealing the law [the law of 1842, under which the tax in question had been levied] and accepting the provisions of the treaty, etc. The foregoing paragraph of that opinion was pressed upon our attention in the De Circe Case, and the court was, on its account, urged to reverse the ruling of their predecessors in the Dufour and other cases; but this insistence did not prevail, and the ruling in the Dufour Case was adhered to. But, independently of that consideration, it must be borne in mind that the act of 1842 was repealed in 1877, and was not again revived until 1894; and in the meanwhile, if not before the provisions of the French treaty were operative, and the subsequent revival of the law could not abrogate or defeat them. The next case cited is Frederickson v. Louisiana, 64 U. S. 23 How. 445, 16 L. ed. 577, which involved an interpretation of the Bavarian treaty, and a decision of this court also. In allowed to sell and withdraw the proceeds of the land, expired in 1856, and the contention was that before that time the treaty of 1850, which was ratified in 1855, came into operation and extended the term indefinitely, the court held that the claim to the realty was barred, and affirmed the decisions of the court of appeals of Kentucky allowing the foreign heirs their claim to the personalty, but holding that they had no interest in the realty, and that the widow of the decedent became invested with the title to all the lands that he held at his death. Jecker v. Magee, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 32, 19 L. ed. 571.

In Yeaker v. Yeaker, 4 Met. (Ky.) 33, 81 Am. Dec. 530, 534, the treaty between the United States and the Swiss Confederation invested aliens with an interest in lands in cases where they asserted their claim within three years after their right accrued, and it was held that until the expiration of such time the right to hold was inviolable, but that after the expiration of such time the law of the state would predominate.

XV. Württemberg.

In Re Strobel's Estate, 39 N. Y. Supp. 169, it was sought to exempt the property of the decedent from a tax imposed by the New York laws of 1887, chap. 713, the contention being that such property was not subject to taxation for the reason that the treaty between the United States and Württemberg, passed in the year 1844, exempted such property "from all duties of detraction," but the court held that the tax imposed by the statute did not fall within the provision of the treaty, but was a tax upon succession; and further that by the change of government between the Kingdom of Württemberg and Prussia, the treaty of 1844 was abrogated by the treaty entered into by the United States and Germany in 1871.

The treaty between the United States and the Kingdom of Württemberg (art. 2) provides that where, on the death of any person holding any property within the territories of one party, such real estate would, by the law of the land, descend on a citizen or subject of the other were he not disqualified by alienage, such citizen or subject shall be allowed two years to sell the same, which term may be reasonably prolonged according to circumstances, and to withdraw the proceeds thereof without molestations and exempt from all duties.

In Wieland v. Renner, 65 How. Pr 245, it was held that the provisions of the above treaty were, in effect, a statute of limitations, and in the absence of any prolongation the time affixed by such treaty must prevail.

In Kull v. Kull, 37 Hun, 476, a naturalized citizen died intestate in 1883, leaving no children or father or mother, but a widow, a sister, two brothers, and nephews and nieces, children of deceased brothers who died in 1878 and 1874 respectively him surviving, two of such being nonresident aliens, subjects of the Kingdom of Württemberg. The court held that under the provisions of the treaty the fee vested in the nonresident aliens, the land being descendible as described by the treaty, and that under its provisions an alien heir might come to the state and at once enter into possession, use, and enjoyment of the property, and exercise rights of ownership and use of possession for the purpose of making sale, such rights, being conferred upon him by the treaty, which intended to confer on an alien heir, for the period of two years, precisely the same rights he would enjoy if a resident heir, imposing upon him simply an obligation to sell and convey to some other party capable of holding, within such period or such prolonged period as the state might confer, or by his becoming, or declaring his intention to become, a citizen, and that in the meanwhile he might possess and improve the property and exercise authority and enjoy the rents and profits, the state's rights being suspended for two years, the rights of other heirs being also suspended by operation of the treaty, its effect being to vest the alien heirs with title to their respective proportions of the rents and income into whatsoever hands it might come. E. W.

that case the court, through Mr. Justice Campbell, said, "The case before the district court in Louisiana concerned the distribution of the succession of a citizen of that state, and of property situated there," and then added that they concurred with this court "in the opinion that the treaty does not regulate the testamentary dispositions of citizens or subjects of the contracting powers, in reference to property within the country of their origin or citizenship. The cause of the treaty was, that the citizens and subjects of each of the contracting powers were, or might be, subject to onerous taxes upon property possessed by them within the states of the other, by reason of their alienage, and its purpose was to enable such persons to dispose of their property, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country where the property lies, pay under like conditions. The case of a citizen or subject of the respective countries residing at home, and disposing of property there, in favor of a citizen or subject of the other, was not in the contemplation of the contracting powers, and is not embraced in this article of the treaty." The opinion of the court in that case does not in any way militate against the decisions of this court. The record shows that Amelie Rixner died at Marcella, Sicily, where she was domiciled, and at that place she executed her last will, on the 24th of July, 1892; that her property is situated in Louisiana, where her succession is being administered, and her universal legatee resides at the place of her domicil. It is therefore evident that this case does not come within the purview of that decision.

This investigation has led us to the conclusion that the situation of the parties to this litigation is the same, identically, as that of the litigants in the Dufour and other cases, and that the heir of the deceased is quite as much entitled to the protection of the French treaty as were the subjects and citizens of France, he having invoked the benefit of "the most favored nation" clause in the Italian treaty with the United States. In Levy v. Hitsche, 40 La. Ann. 501, we said, after a careful review of the authorities, that, after the intent and meaning of a law have been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, in so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the law as the text itself; and the same rule must be true in so far, also, as treaty rights and obligations are concerned. Vide, Douglass, v Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968; State v. Thompson, 10 La. Ann. 122. It is both wise and conservative for courts "to adhere to what has already been adjudged." Entertaining this view we deem it unnecessary to examine and decide the constitutionality of act 130 of 1894; for, accepting the same in its fullest force, it yields precedence to the treaty stipulations invoked as part of the supreme law of the land.

Judgment affirmed.

1. The right to raise water by means of pumps for purposes of irrigation may be included in the rights of a riparian proprietor.
2. The reasonableness or lawfulness of any diversion of water is in no wise affected by the mere mode of diversion.
3. The altitude of the land of a riparian proprietor, which makes it impossible to irrigate it solely by natural gravitation from the stream without the aid of appliances other than ditches and dams thereon which will not back the water on lands of other persons, will not defeat his right to a just and equal proportion of the water for irrigating purposes.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendants in an action to enjoin alleged wrongful use of the water of a certain stream. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
Mr. E. E. Howard for appellants.
Mr. R. Dunnigan for respondents.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by several riparian proprietors against certain persons above them on the stream, to restrain them from diverting any of the waters of the stream. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are riparian proprietors, and as such entitled to all the waters of the stream; that the defendants are not entitled to use any of the water for any purpose; and that they, by means of certain machinery, artificially and wrongfully raise and divert from the stream a large amount of the waters thereof, for the purpose of irrigating certain lands not of right irrigable from the stream, and which do not so lie as to be irrigated by the waters of said stream "diverted therefrom by any natural means" on said lands. The facts found by the court are, in substance, that both plaintiffs and defendants are riparian proprietors on the stream, the lands of defendants being above those of plaintiffs, and that neither plaintiffs nor defendants have any right to the waters of the stream, except as such riparian owners; that all of the lands of the plaintiffs, and 30 acres of the lands of the defendants, are so situated that the water of the stream can be diverted and conducted thereon solely by natural gravity from dams in the stream, situated within the limits of said lands, respectively, without backing the water upon the lands of the owners next above them, and that no other part of the lands of the defendants can be irrigated in that manner; that the defendants have erected pumping machinery and pumps on their land, and, by means thereof, pump water from the stream onto land belonging to them, bordering on the stream and within its watershed, but which lie too high to be irrigated solely by natural gravity from dams situated within the limits of their lands without backing the water upon the lands of others above them; that all of the lands of both parties are dry, and of little value without irrigation but are of great value and very productive when irrigated; that defendants have not used, and do not threaten or propose to use, more than their just proportion of the water of the stream. On these findings, judgment was entered in favor of defendants, with leave to any of the parties at any time to "maintain another action to determine the exact proportion of the water of said creek which the respective owners may use." A portion of these findings is attacked as unsupported by the evidence, but we think that the evidence fully justifies them in the particular in which they are so attacked. The only question, then, is whether the findings support the judgment.

NOTE.—The above decision as to the right of a prior appropriator to pump water from a stream for irrigation is an unusual one, although it is not quite without precedent. On the general rights of prior appropriators, see note to Isaacs v. Barber (Wash.) 30 L. R. A. 665.

1. It is contended by appellants that a riparian proprietor has not, for the purpose of irrigation, the right to raise water by means of pumps. No authorities are cited in support of this contention, and counsel states his inability to find any. So far as we can understand, this argument is based on the meaning of the word "irrigate," which counsel contends is "to convey water by ditches," and on the alleged universal custom in the past to employ only such means in irrigation. As to the meaning of the word "irrigation," counsel cites some doubtful passages from civil law writers; but it is evident that this court, in holding, as it has repeatedly held, that riparian proprietors have the right to use a reasonable proportion of the water of the stream to irrigate their lands, used the term in no such restricted sense. The Latin word from which it is derived means, primarily, to convey water to or upon anything, and, more generally, to wet or moisten anything; and the ordinary definition in our language is to water lands, whether by channels, by flooding, or simply by sprinkling. The mere method of obtaining the water with which to irrigate has nothing to do with the process of irrigation, or the meaning of the word. There was no proof in this case of any such custom as is claimed by appellants; and, if we can take judicial notice of such a matter at all, we are unable to say that pumping has never been used for such purpose. It may be that, owing to the comparatively greater expense of that method, it has been little used in the past; but, if improvements in machinery have made or shall make that method practicable, we see no reason why riparian proprietors may not, like others, take advantage of such improvements. In fact it has always been considered that the reasonableness or lawfulness of any given diversion of water is in no wise affected by the mere mode of diversion. Thus, in Elliot v. Fitchburg R. Co. 10 Cush. 191 (cited with approval in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 402, 404), Chief Justice Shaw said. "One man . . . may take water from a perennial stream of moderate size by means of buckets or a pump,—for the mode is not material,—to water his garden." And in such a case, he says, "the water would be used for irrigation" and such "might be regarded as a reasonable use." So this court has repeatedly held that a prior appropriator of water may change, at pleasure, the place or mode of his diversion, so long as others are not injured by such change. And in Earl Norbury, v. Kitchin, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 685, it was held that a riparian proprietor, so long as he took no more than his reasonable share of the water, might take water from the stream by pumping machinery, elevate it into a reservoir, and thence convey it by pipes to other land, not riparian, and there use it; the court holding that neither the mode of diversion nor the use to which the water was actually applied was material,—the only question being whether or not the defendant had taken more than his reasonable share.

2. But appellants claim, as we understand them, that, whether the particular mode is material or not, the mode by which the land of a riparian proprietor can possibly be irrigated is a material factor in ascertaining what portion of the water he may divert for irrigation. They contend that a riparian proprietor cannot be allowed to use any portion of the water of the stream to irrigate land which, though bordering on the stream, lies so far above it that water cannot be conducted thereon solely by natural gravitation from the stream, without the use of any appliances other than ditches originally on such land and dams situated thereon, and which will not back the water on the lands of other persons. In other words, the reasonable proportion of water which any riparian proprietor may withdraw for irrigation is made to depend, primarily, upon the area of his land which can be irrigated in that particular manner. In the first place, that question does not properly arise in this case. The complaint was framed on the theory that the defendants were not riparian proprietors at all, and had no right to divert any water. No issue was tendered as to what amount or proportion of the water of the stream could lawfully be used by the defendants, if they had the right to use any portion. It was denied that they had any rights to the stream, and the complaint furnished no data from which any rights of the parties, as tenants in common of the water, could be determined. Nevertheless, as the question seems to have been treated as an issue, evidence being introduced on the subject, apparently without objection, and as the court below did, to a certain extent, consider it, it calls for consideration at our hands. No authorities whatever are cited by appellants in support of this contention, nor can we find that any such doctrine has ever been even suggested by any court or writer. Appellants do cite some cases to the point that riparian diversion must be "on the bank of the proprietor," but the judgments in those cases do not sustain that doctrine, and we are not prepared to say that any such rule exists. It is, however, not necessary to decide that question, for its determination would shed no light on the subject now under consideration. The only question now is whether the mere altitude of this land can deprive the riparian owner of the right to irrigate it. No rules have ever been laid down by this court for determining the relative and proportional rights of riparian proprietors to the use of water for irrigation, nor has any case come before us in which we could properly determine what are the rules on that subject. But, whatever difficulties may arise in matters of detail, that problem must find its solution in an application of the principles upon which the right to use water for that purpose at all is based. That right, as recognized in the decisions of this court, is founded upon the proposition that in an arid country the use of water for irrigation is of such vital consequence that, of necessity, it must be considered as embraced within the spirit of the category of rights accorded by the common law to riparian proprietors. The common law rule, as interpreted in this country, is that the right to the waters of the stream, with certain exceptions, not material here, belongs to the riparian proprietors in common and equally, and may be exercised by each as the necessities of the situation may require, only so as not to infringe upon the equal rights of the others. As irrigation is here a necessity of the situation, resulting from climatic conditions, the right to use a just and equal portion of the water for that purpose has been held to be an essential part of the riparian ownership.

Such being the foundation of the right, it is evident that the restriction contended for by appellants is inconsistent with the rule itself. The right to use the water for this purpose results from the need of water upon the land. Assuming this need, in any given case, to exist equally as to all the riparian land, the respective rights of the proprietors to divert water for this purpose must be in proportion to their respective ownerships upon the stream. No other method would conform to the rule of equity. If every riparian proprietor on a given stream owned the same quantity of land, with the same frontage on the stream, and with the same susceptibility to and need of irrigation, each would be entitled to precisely the same quantity of water for that purpose. We do not now decide how far a variation in any one of those factors would affect the question nor whether all of them are necessarily to be considered in any case. But it must necessarily be true, from the very nature of the right, that in no case can one proprietor be deprived of this just and equal proportion merely because his land, by reason of its altitude or level above the stream, cannot be irrigated by the same method employed on some other land. That the rule contended for by appellants would be utterly inconsistent with the very foundations of the riparian doctrine in this country will readily be seen by observing its results in particular instances. According to appellants' theory, none of the waters of the Colorado river, in the greater part of its course, can ever be used by the riparian owners for irrigation, for none of them can erect a dam high enough to divert any water by gravity on his own land without backing the water upon his neighbor. The same is true of many important streams in the mountainous districts of this state, now extensively used for irrigation. Yet nowhere is irrigation more needed than in such localities. Coming next to the level plains, we find streams with so little fall that diversion by a dam on the very tract of land to be irrigated is only possible on tracts having very considerable frontage on the stream. Suppose six adjoining proprietors on such a stream, neither of whom can divert the water on his own land in the manner required by appellants. According to appellants' contention, they could not, even by agreement among themselves, divert the water on the land of one, and carry it to the land of another, of their number, or pump it onto the land of any of them. They must permit all the water to flow down to the more fortunate proprietor below, whose acres are thousands to their hundreds. And yet, if one of the six should buy the lands of the others, he would then be entitled to divert the water. Such are some of the consequences, suggesting themselves to the mind, of the rule we are asked to declare, and they show clearly that the mode of diversion of the water is a false quantity in the discussion. Whatever be the just proportion of water to which any riparian proprietor is entitled, that proportion cannot be diminished by the fact that, in order to utilize it, he must raise it from the bed of the stream by pumps or other similar appliances. Every diversion of water from a stream is artifical,—a disturbance of the natural order of things. A dam or a ditch is as much an artificial mechanism as a pump,—it may, indeed, be much more so; and the one alters the natural conditions in the same sense that the other does. The right to take the water at all is a right to change the ordinary course of nature; and the methods employed, so long as their use does not infringe the like and equal rights of others, are immaterial. We do not wish to be understood as now deciding how, in any given case, the respective proportions of the different owners upon a stream are to be determined. Whether they are to be ascertained according to the extent of ownership or frontage along the stream, or according to the area of land bordering on the stream, or the amount of land needing or susceptible of irrigation, or the character of the soil, or according to several or all of these circumstances, or other circumstances that may exist, has never been decided, nor has there been, so far as we know, any opportunity for deciding it. We merely hold that the mere mode of diverting the water from the stream, so long as that mode does not deprive others of their equal rights, is not a factor to be considered. We will add, in view of any further effort that the parties may make to obtain a judicial determination of their respective rights in this stream, that a final and satisfactory adjustment can never be had without the presence of every person having any right in the stream, and that all the facts which can possibly bear on the question should be laid before the court. In the present case, as we have suggested, no sufficient data are furnished by the pleadings or evidence for a determination of that question, and the learned judge of the court below would have been justified in no other disposition of the case as presented than the one made.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: Harrison, J.; Garoutte, J.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(111 Cal. 220.)

1. An action against a carrier for violation of his obligation to carry a passenger may be in the nature of an action on the case.

2. The wrongful expulsion by a conductor of a passenger who had no ticket because it had been taken up by another conductor renders the carrier liable.

3. A passenger is not called upon to question the right of a conductor in taking up a ticket, in order to preserve the right to be carried to destination.

4. It is a matter of general knowledge that an attack of sudden fright or an exposure to imminent peril may produce a complete change in the nervous system of an individual, and render weak and timid one who was physically strong and vigorous.

5. Paroxysms of the nervous system caused by the indignity and humiliation suffered by a passenger on being wrongfully ejected from a train constitute a bodily injury for which damages are recoverable.

6. Ignorance of a carrier of the susceptibility of a passenger to nervous disturbance, and absence of reason to anticipate nervous disorder from an injury, will not prevent its liability if such a disorder is actually caused by its negligence.

7. Reasonable prudence of a woman when ejected from a train in undertaking to walk to a certain place is a question for the jury.

8. Technical error in refusing to strike out mere probative matter from a complaint is not ground for reversal.

9. A complaint for personal injuries specifying humiliation, injuries to health, etc., as elements of damage, need not designate the particular amount of damage sustained in each particular.

10. A denial by a corporation for want of sufficient information and belief is insufficient if the matters alleged were presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers, even if the one verifying the answer was without information or belief upon the subject.

11. A verdict of $1,400 for the ejection of a woman from a train, which obliged her to walk about a mile and caused a recurrence of insomnia and nervous paroxysms to which she had been subject, is excessive.

12. A remittitur of the excess of a verdict may be required as a condition of denying a reversal.

It is immaterial that the injury is charged to have been committed in violation of a contract. Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff Annie L. Sloane purchased a ticket, April 8, 1894, from the agent of the defendant, at North Pomona, for passage from that place to San Diego, and on the same day took passage upon the regular passenger train of the defendant. Before reaching San Bernardino the conductor of the train took up her ticket, without giving her any check or other evidence of her right to be carried to San Diego, and on arriving at San Bernardino she was required to change cars, and enter another train of cars of the defendant. After entering this train of cars the conductor in charge thereof demanded of her her ticket, and upon her stating to him that she had given it to the conductor of the other train, and the circumstances therewith, she was informed by him that she must either pay her fare or leave the train. She had no money with her, and when the train reached East Riverside she left the car. After getting off the train, she started to walk back as far as Colton upon the railroad track, a distance of about 3 miles, but, after walking a portion of the way, secured a seat in a passing vehicle, and was carried to Colton, where she spent the night with her sister-in law. On the next day, having borrowed some money with which to purchase another ticket, she resumed her passage, and was carried to San Diego. The present action was brought to recover damages sustained by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant's agents. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,400. From the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

It is contended by the appellant that, as the plaintiff left the car at East Riverside in accordance with the previous directions of the conductor, and no personal violence was used or displayed towards her, her only right of action is for a breach of the defendant's contract to carry her to San Diego, and that the extent of her recovery therefor is the price paid for the second ticket, and a reasonable compensation for the loss of time sustained by her. The plaintiff's right of action against the defendant is not, however, limited to the breach of its contract to carry her to San Diego, but includes full redress for the wrongs sustained by her by reason of the defendant's violation of the obligations which it assumed in entering into such contract. If she was wrongfully prevented by the defendant from completing the passage to San Diego for which it had contracted with her, she could either bring an action simply for the breach of this contract, or she could sue it in tort, for its violation of the duty, as a common carrier, which it assumed upon entering into such contract. Jones v. The Cortes 17 Cal. 487; Head v. Georgia P. R. Co. 79 Ga. 358; Carsten v. Northern P. R. Co. 44 Minn. 454, 9 L. R. A. 688. The complaint in the present case is not merely for the breach of the contract, nor is it merely for the wrong committed in excluding her from the car, but it is to recover the damages sustained by her by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant committed in the violation of its contract. It is in the nature of an action on the case arising out of the conduct of the defendant in wrongfully depriving her of her ticket, and thereafter, by reason of such wrongful act, excluding her from its car, and refusing to carry out its contract. Although her action is for the tort resulting from the defendant's conduct, the wrong which produced that result was twofold, —depriving her of the evidence of its contract to carry her to San Diego, and afterwards excluding her from its car for failure to produce the evidence of which it had wrongfully deprived her. For the purpose of giving her this right of action, it is immaterial that these different acts were by different agents of the defendant. If the conductor who took up the ticket had himself, at a subsequent point in the trip, excluded her for failure to exhibit it, the liability of the defendant would not be questioned. Its liability is the same, notwithstanding, for its own convenience, it has intrusted the management of its train to different conductors Muckle v. Rochester R. Co. 79 Hun, 32. The plaintiff was not called upon to question the right of the first conductor in taking up her ticket, and it was the duty of the defendant to see that she was not thereby deprived of her right to a passage upon its cars.

In her testimony regarding her exclusion from the cars, the plaintiff recounted the interview between her and the conductor, and the manner in which she was directed to leave the car, and it was claimed at the trial that she had been thereby subjected to humiliation and indignity, for which she was entitled to redress. Counsel for the appellant does not question, as a proposition of law, that, if the conductor was insulting and violent in removing her, such treatment forms an element of damage to be recovered by her; but he maintains that the evidence fails to show such conduct. The evidence was, however, before the jury, and they were properly instructed in reference thereto; and, although it might be urged upon them that this evidence was insufficient to establish such conduct, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that it was not proper to submit the question to their judgment.

Evidence was given at the trial tending to show that Mrs. Sloane had been previously subject to insomnia, and also to nervous shocks and paroxysms, and that, owing to her physical condition, she was subject to a recurrence of these shocks or nervous disorder if placed under any great mental excitement; and that, by reason of the excitement caused by her exclusion from the car, there had been a recurrence of insomnia and of these paroxysms. The court instructed the jury that, if they found for the plaintiffs, "in assessing damages, if it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff Annie L. Sloane was wrongfully deprived of her right to ride on defendant's cars, and expelled therefrom in a manner and under circumstances calculated to inflict, and which did inflict, feelings of indignity and insult, the jury is authorized to consider under the evidence, the injured feelings of the plaintiff, the indignity endured, her mental suffering, the humiliation and wounded pride which one in her condition of life and standing in the community would experience, together with any bodily harm or suffering occasioned, and to award such an amount for damages as will compensate her for such humiliation, suffering, and other detriment." The jury were not specially instructed with reference to any damages that might have been sustained by reason of the recurrence of this disturbance of the nervous system, but it is reasonable to suppose that the above evidence was offered by the plaintiffs for the purpose of recovering damages for the injury that might be thus established, and that, under that portion of the above instruction in which the jury were authorized in assessing damages to consider "any bodily harm or suffering occasioned" by the explusion of Mrs. Sloane from the cars, it was intended that they should consider this evidence, and the injury which it established. The defendant objected to the introduction of the evidence, and excepted to the instruction, and insists that under no circumstances could the jury consider this effect upon the plaintiff as an element of damage for which the defendant is liable; that the court should not have directed the jury to consider any mental suffering experienced by her.

Counsel for the appellant has discussed, in his brief, the want of liability on the part of the defendant for any damages for mental suffering, and has cited many authorities in support of the proposition that mere mental anxiety, unaccompanied with bodily injury or apprehended peril, does not afford a right of action. To the extent that the term "mental suffering" is included in the above instruction, this proposition is inapplicable. The term, as there used, is to be construed with reference to the context in which it occurs. The "mental suffering," there named, is not the mental anguish or pain referred to in the above proposition cited by the appellant, but is the mental experience which is concomitant with the insult, indignity, and humiliation named in the instruction. It would be a contradiction of terms to hold that the individual whose pride had been humiliated, or whose dignity had been insulted, had no mental suffering in connection therewith, or that this humiliation and insult did not of themselves constitute mental suffering; that he could have redress for the injured pride, but not for the mental suffering it produced. Although mental suffering alone will not support an action, yet it constitutes an aggravation of damages when it naturally ensues from the act complained of. 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 1245.

The real question presented by the objections and exception of the appellant is whether the subsequent nervous disturbance of the plaintiff was a suffering of the body or of the mind. The interdependence of the mind and body is in many respects so close that it is impossible to distinguish their respective influence upon each other. It must be conceded that a nervous shock or paroxysm, or a disturbance of the nervous system, is distinct from mental anguish, and falls within the physiological, rather than the psychological, branch of the human organism. It is a matter of general knowledge that an attack of sudden fright, or an exposure to imminent peril, has produced in individuals a complete change in their nervous system, and rendered one who was physically strong and vigorous weak and timid. Such a result must be regarded as an injury to the body rather than to the mind, even though the mind be at the same time injuriously affected. Whatever may be the influence by which the nervous system is affected, its action under that influence is entirely distinct from the mental process which is set in motion by the brain. The nerves and nerve centers of the body are a part of the physical system, and are not only susceptible of lesion from external causes, but are also liable to be weakened and distroyed from causes primarily acting upon the mind. If these nerves, or the entire nervous system, are thus affected, there is a physical injury thereby produced, and, if the primal cause of this injury is tortious, it is immaterial whether it is direct, as by a blow, or indirect, through some action upon the mind.

This subject received a very careful and elaborate consideration in the case of Bell v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 26 Ir. 428. Mrs.

Bell was a passenger upon one of the defendant's trains, and by reason of the defendant's negligence in the management of its train suffered great fright, in consequence of which her health was seriously impaired. She had previously been a strong, healthy woman, but it was shown that, after this occurrence, she suffered from fright and nervous shock, and was troubled with insomnia, and that her health was seriously impaired. The jury were instructed that if, in their opinion, great fright was a reasonable and natural consequence of the circumstances in which the defendant by its negligence had placed her, and that she was actually put in fright by those circumstances, and if the injury to her health was, in their opinion, the reasonable and natural consequence of such great fright, and was actually occasioned thereby, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for such injury. It was objected to this instruction that unless the fright was accompanied by physical injury, even though there might be a nervous shock occasioned by the fright such damages would be too remote. In holding that this objection was not well founded, and that the nervous shock was to be considered as a bodily injury, the court held that, if such bodily injury might be a natural consequence of fright, it was an element of damage for which a recovery might be had, and, referring to the contention of the defendant, said: "It is admitted that, as the negligence caused fright, if the fright contemporaneously caused physical injury, the damage would not be too remote. The distinction insisted upon is one of time only. The proposition is that although, if an act of negligence produces such an effect upon particular structures of the body as at the moment to afford palpable evidence of physical injury, the relation of proximate cause and effect exists between such negligence and the injury, yet such relation cannot in law exist in the case of a similar act producing upon the same structures an effect which at a subsequent time—say a week, a fortnight, or a month—must result without any intervening cause in the same physical injury. As well might it be said that a death caused by poison is not to be attributed to the person who administered it, because the mortal effect is not produced contemporaneously with its administration." At the close of its opinion Lord Chief Baron Palles says: "In conclusion, I am of the opinion that, as the relation between fright and injury to the nerve and brain structures of the body is a matter which depends entirely upon scientific and medical testimony, it is impossible for any court to lay down as a matter of law that, if negligence cause fright, and such fright in its turn so affect such structures as to cause injury to health, such injury cannot be a consequence which, in the ordinary course of things, would flow from the negligence, unless such injury accompanied such negligence in point of time." This case is quoted at great length and with approval in the eighth edition of Mr. Sedgwick's treaties on Damages, at section 860. Mr. Beven, in the recent edition of his work on Negligence (vol. 1, pp 77–81), also comments upon it with great approval. In Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, the defendant so negligently managed one of its cars that a collision with an approaching cable car seemed imminent, and was so nearly caused that the attendant confusion of ringing alarm bells and of passengers rushing out produced in the plaintiff, who was a passenger on the car, a sudden fright, which threw her into convulsions, and, she being then pregnant, caused in her a miscarriage, and subsequent illness. The court held that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, and that it was liable therefor, even though the immediate result of the negligence was only fright, saying: "A mental shock or disturbance sometimes causes injury or illness of body, especially of the nervous system." See also Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451; Seger v. Barkhamsted, 22 Conn. 290; Mann Boudoir Car Co. v. Dupre, 4 C. C. A. 540, 54 Fed. Rep. 646, 21 L. R. A. 289, 13 U. S. App. 183; Stutz v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 147; Razzo v. Varni, 81 Cal. 289. "It is a physical injury to the person to be thrown out of a wagon, or to be compelled to jump out, even although the harm done consists mainly of nervous shock." Warren v. Boston & M. R. Co. 163 Mass 484.

The mental condition which superinduced the bodily harm in the foregoing cases was fright, but the character of the mental excitation by which the injury to the body is produced is immaterial. If it can be established that the bodily harm is the direct result of the condition, without any intervening cause, it must be held that the act which caused the condition set in motion the agencies by which the injury was produced, and is the proximate cause of such injury. Whether the indignity and humiliation suffered by Mrs. Sloane caused the nervous paroxysm, and the injury to her health from which she subsequently suffered, was a question of fact, to be determined by the jury. There was evidence before them tending to establish such fact, and if they were satisfied, from that evidence, that these results were directly traceable to that cause, and that her expulsion from the car had produced in her such a disturbance of her nervous system as resulted in these paroxysms, they were authorized to include in their verdict whatever damage she had thus sustained. Whether the defendant or its agents knew of her susceptibility to nervous disturbance was immaterial. She had the same rights as any other person who might become a passenger on its road, and was entitled to as high degree of care on its part. It was not necessary that this injury should have been anticipated in order to entitle her to a recovery therefor. Civ. Code, § 3333. If the facts under which she was excluded from the car would be an act of negligence on the part of the defendant as to any and all persons, whoever might sustain injury by such act would be entitled to recover to the full extent of his injury, irrespective of his previous physical condition or susceptibility to harm. In Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 74, and 619, 48 Am. Rep. 134, the plaintiff was injured upon a car of the defendant, and thereafter a cancer developed itself upon her breast at the place where she had been hurt. Testimony was given to the effect that such hurt was sufficient to cause the development of the cancer, and that, in the opinion of the experts, they would attribute it to that cause. It was shown that, previous to the accident she had been in apparently good health and condition. The court held that it was for the jury to determine, from the evidence, whether the cancer did result from the injury, and, if so, that the defendant was liable, even though it had no reason to anticipate such a result. "It is not for the defendants to say that because they did not, or could not in fact, anticipate such a result of their negligent act, they must therefore be exonerated from liability for such consequences as ensued. They must be taken to know, and to contemplate, all the natural and proximate consequences, not only that certainly would, but that probably might, flow from their wrongful act." See also Fell v. Northern P. R. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 253.

The court properly left to the jury to determine whether Mrs. Sloane exercised reasonable prudence in undertaking the walk from East Riverside to Colton, and, if so, that the injury sustained by her was a proper element of damage to be recovered. It could not say, as matter of law, or instruct the jury, that under the evidence before them such walk was or was not necessary, or whether the route selected by her was the most feasible; nor would it have been justified in directing them not to allow compensation for any injury sustained by the walk, upon the ground that, if she had waited a few hours, she could have gone upon the cars. Malone v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 152 Pa. 390.

The refusal of the court to strike out certain portions of the complaint as irrelevant is not a ground for reversal of the judgment. The matter embraced therein was relevant to the plaintiffs' right of recovery, and they were justified in setting forth in their complaint the several acts of the defendant which constituted the wrong for which they sought redress. The defendant does not claim to have been prejudiced by any of the probative matters contained in these allegations, and, even if this matter might have been properly struck out by the court, after the cause has been tried upon its merits, the judgment will not be reversed for such technical error.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The cause of action set forth therein is neither ambiguous nor uncertain. It clearly states a single ground of recovery, viz., the unlawful violation by the defendant of the obligation it had assumed to carry Mrs. Sloane to San Diego; and, although the damages caused to her by this violation of its obligation were made up of the injuries to her person, as well as the money paid by her as the consideration of this obligation, they all resulted from the wrong committed by the defendant. It was necessary that she should point out the particulars in which she had sustained injuries from the defendant,—the humiliation, injuries to her health, etc.— in order that evidence thereof might be given at the trial, and also that the defendant might be prepared to meet such evidence; but it was not necessary that she should designate the particular amount of damage which she had sustained by reason of the indignity that she had been compelled to undergo, distinct from the amount sustained from the injury to her health. These elements of damage were not capable of computation, nor would evidence of such amount have been admissible. This amount was to be determined by the jury, in the exercise of an intelligent discretion.

Neither does the action of the court in striking out a portion of the defendant's answer justify a reversal of the judgment. The denial of an allegation in the complaint for want of sufficient information and belief to enable the defendant to answer the same justifies the court in disregarding or striking out such denial, if the matter is presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant; and, although a corporation does not itself have any knowledge of the matters alleged, but is compelled to act through its officers, whose information may be derived from others, yet it cannot place its denials upon its want of information and belief, if the matters alleged were presumptively within the knowledge of any of its officers, even though the officer verifying the answer was himself without any information or belief upon the subject. In the present case it, moreover, clearly appears that the defendant was not prejudiced by the action of the court. In a separate defense to the action, the defendant directly alleged many of the facts which, in the portion of the answer thus struck out, it had denied for want of information and belief; and, although an admission in one defense is not available as against a denial in another, it is competent for the court to consider such admission for the purpose of determining whether the answer containing the denial is sham or evasive. After the ruling of the court the defendant amended its answer by directly denying the matters alleged in one of the paragraphs which the court held had been insufficiently denied, and at the trial it stipulated to the truth of the matters that had been denied by it in another of the paragraphs which was stricken out. The defendant was therefore not precluded from defending the action in any particular upon which it relied. After a cause has been tried upon its merits, a ruling of the court either in striking out, or in refusing to strike out, a portion of a pleading, will not justify a reversal of the judgment, if it appears that the party against whom the ruling was made has not been prejudiced thereby, and has been able to present to the court his entire cause of action or defense. Mere technical error, unaccompanied by injury, will be disregarded. Code Civ. Proc § 475.

The court did not err in its instructions to the jury respecting the measure of care which a railroad company must exercise towards its passengers. Rorer, Railroads, p. 951; Georgia R. Co. v. Homer, 73 Ga. 251. The passenger is not required to question the action of the conductor in taking up his ticket, but has to assume that his conduct in taking or withholding the ticket is in accordance with the rules of the company. It is therefore incumbent upon the conductor to exercise more than ordinary care in seeing that, after he has taken the ticket from the passenger, the latter shall be provided with the means of continuing his journey. It is not error to hold that this requires extreme care and diligence. We are of the opinion, however, that the damages allowed by the jury were excessive, and not justified by the evidence. They were properly told that they could not award the plaintiff exemplary damages, but only such as would be a full and fair compensation to her for the injury and detriment she had suffered as the proximate results of the defendant's wrongful acts. The testimony tending to show that the conductor was rude and insulting in directing her to leave the train at East Riverside is quite meager, and consists more of her statement of its character than of the language used by him. The jury were instructed that, in estimating the amount of damages she could recover by reason of the humiliation in being excluded from the car, they were not at liberty to consider her peculiar nervous temperament, but to allow only such damages as would have resulted to a person of ordinary or usual temperament. So, too, the evidence concerning the effect of this expulsion from the car upon her nervous condition consists more of general statements than of details, and it does not appear that this effect was of more than brief duration. She does not claim to have sustained any direct physical injury by reason of the walk to Colton. She testifies, as do also her husband and Dr. Averill, that, except for her nervous condition, she was in fair health, and that she was abundantly able to take a walk of 2 or 3 miles, and it is not suggested that the walk had any effect upon her nervous condition, or that she suffered any direct inconvenience therefrom after her return to San Diego. The walk itself was not attended with any unusual inconvenience. It was upon the railroad track, in a level county, on an afternoon in April. The distance is not given, but, after going about a mile, or as far as the railroad bridge, she was taken into a passing vehicle, and carried to Colton. While the amount of damages that may be awarded in a case like the present is in the discretion of the jury, it must be a reasonable and not an unlimited, discretion, and must be exercised intelligently and in harmony with the testimony before them. We think that the jury in the present case must have been influenced by other considerations than the testimony before them in arriving at the amount of their verdict.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed unless the plaintiffs shall, within thirty days after the filing of the remittitur in the superior court, file with the clerk and give to the defendant a stipulation remitting from the judgment the sum of $1,000. If such stipulation be so filed and delivered, the superior court is directed to amend the judgment in conformity therewith, and thereupon the judgment and order shall stand affirmed.

(.....Ala.....)

Damages for the conversion of logs in an action against one who purchased them innocently from an inadvertent trespasser are measured by the value of the logs immediately after severance, with interest thereon, excluding any enhancement of the value by transportation to another place.

(January 16, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Geneva County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the value of certain logs which defendants were alleged to have wrongfully converted to their own use. Reversed.

The principal defense to the action was that at the time of the alleged conversion defendants were engaged in cutting timber from property adjoining that of plaintiff, and not knowing the true dividing line and without any intention of taking or appropriating any of plaintiff's property, they mistakenly cut it and carried it away.

The court gave a general affirmative charge for plaintiff and refused to instruct the jury that plaintiff could not recover as damages more than the proved value of logs prior to the removal of them from the land.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. M. E. Milligan for appellants.

Mr. J. J. Morris for appellee.

Head, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case was tried in the lower court upon the second count of the complaint, which was in trover, and claimed damages "for the conversion of 100 pine logs cut and taken away" from the lands of the plaintiff. The material facts are that, within a year prior to the commencement of the suit, one Jack Brewer cut the pine logs from the timber lands belonging to the plaintiff, and sold them to defendants, to be delivered on the banks of Pea river, where he did in fact deliver them; and that neither he nor the defendants knew at the time the cutting was done that trespasses were being committed on the plaintiff's property, this fact not having been discovered until a survey was made, some time after the acts complained of had been performed. The defendants disposed of the logs, which were worth 4 cents per foot, at Pea river. These facts were established by the plaintiff's witness, and in regard to them there was no dispute. With a view to mitigating the damages, the defendants offered to prove the value of the logs prior to their removal from the land, accompanying the offer with the statement to the court that they expected to prove the logs were worth materially more after being transported to and placed on the banks of Pea river than they were before such removal. The court refused to allow this proof to be made, and to the ruling an exception was duly reserved. This presents the single question of merit to be decided upon the appeal.

It will be observed from the foregoing statement, that the record makes the case of a conversion by purchasers, innocent of wrongdoing, from an inadvertent trespasser, who by the expenditure of time, labor, and, doubtless, money, had enhanced the value of the pine logs, after their severance from the freehold and transformation into chattels. The effect of the ruling of the circuit court was to exclude from the jury all evidence upon the subject of value, except that confined and limited to the place of delivery to the defendants, and thereby to necessitate a verdict for the value at that place, as being the only authorized measure of damages justified by the facts of the case. If the law authorized or required the recovery to be calculated upon the basis of the lesser value, under the circumstances stated, it is obvious the ruling of the circuit court was erroneous and prejudicial to appellants. No Alabama case has been found or cited in which the question here presented has been adjudicated. In Riddle v. Driver, 12 Ala. 590, decided in 1847, where trover was brought for 1,500 bushels of coal, into which the wood of the plaintiff had been transformed by the defendant, it was suggested by the court as a possibility that the jury might consider the value of the defendant's labor on the rough material in estimating the damages; but no opinion was given upon the point, as no question upon the measure of damages had been made in the lower court, and hence the case did not call for an authoritative adjudication in respect of the amount of plaintiff's recovery. No occasion seems, subsequently, to have arisen for a decision by this court as to the measure of damages which a plaintiff ought to recover in an action of trover against an unintentional trespasser or his innocent vendee, where, as frequently happens when portions of the realty are severed, the value has been enhanced by the labor of the trespasser in preparing and transporting the chattels to market. Many cases, however, are to be found upon this question, in the reports of other American states, and the English judges have likewise frequently considered and decided it. It would be tedious to review the numerous cases we have examined, and it is unnecessary to do so. It is sufficient to say that the modern authorities are practically unanimous in holding that the rule of just compensation for the injury sustained, which is the ideal measure of actual damages, does not require the assessment, against an inadvertent trespasser, of the accession to the value of a chattel which his labor has produced, but that he is entitled to an abatement therefor from the enhanced value. Winchester v. Craig, 33 Mich. 205; Beede v. Lamprey, 64 N. H. 510, and 10 Am. St. Rep. 426, and many authorities cited in each of those cases. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 829. The same rule prevails when trover is brought against the unintentional trespasser's innocent vendee, who is treated as standing in the shoes of his vendor. Such is this case of E. E. Bolles Wooden Ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 230; Whitney v. Huntington, 37 Minn. 197. It is no answer to this to say that the plaintiff might have brought detinue for the logs wherever he might have found them, short of a change of identity, and thereby have recovered them in specie after their value had been enhanced. In detinue the title prevails, and the question of damages is not considered. If a party aggrieved elects to bring the equitable action of trover, the assessment of damages may be so adjusted as to compensate the plaintiff for his injury, without paying him a premium, or depriving an innocent party of that which he has in good faith added to the chattel. Weymouth v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 17 Wis. 550, 84 Am. Dec. 763. The rule is different if the trespass is wilful or in bad faith. Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co. 21 Minn. 491; Parker v. Waycross & F. R. Co. 81 Ga. 395; Heard v. James, 49 Miss. 236; Tuttle v. White, 46 Mich. 485, 41 Am. Rep. 175; E. E. Bolles Wooden Ware Co. v. United States, supra. The authorities do not agree upon the question whether, in trover against an inadvertent trespasser, or his innocent vendee, for severed portions of the realty, the rule is to allow the value of the property in place, as if it had been purchased in situ by the defendant, at the fair market value of the district,—as, for instance, the value of timber standing, or, for coal or ore mined, the value in place,—or whether the value to be taken as the basis of recovery is that of the property converted immediately after severance, when it becomes a chattel. The case of Wood v. Morewood, 3 Q. B. 440 (which is regarded as conflicting with the earlier English cases), is the leading English, and Forsyth v. Wells, 41 Pa. 291, 80 Am. Dec. 617, subsequently criticised in that state, is one of the leading American, cases supporting the rule first stated, and they have been frequently followed. Many cases which are often cited in favor of the same rule may be distinguished by noting that they were not actions of trover, or that they arose in states which have abolished forms of action, or that the decisions were made in proceedings in equity where the courts were not influenced by the technical rules governing the various common-law actions. In this state, forms of action have not been abolished, and parties must be here held to the legitimate and logical consequences of the particular action which has been instituted.

Trover is brought for the conversion of personal property, and it would seem incongruous to say that the damages could be assessed upon the principle adopted in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, when the gravamen of the complaint is essentially different. Cases can be easily perceived in which the value of the timber after severance would very inadequately compensate the owner for the trespass. This would be so when the trees were prematurely cut, or were valuable for shade or fruit. Under such circumstances, he may accommodate his selection of a form of action to the necessities of the case, and bring trespass for entering his land, and severing and removing timber or trees, in which case he would recover, as actual damages, the diminished value of the land, or, to state it more definitely, the value of the trees standing and any injury to the freehold by reason of their removal. Foote v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 151; Mitchell v. Billingsley, 17 Ala. 391; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 563–566. When trover is brought, the trespass upon the land is, so to speak, waived or disregarded; and when brought for the conversion of logs or trees as chattels, under the circumstances of this case, the true rule, in our opinion, is the second above stated, according to which the value immediately after severance, with interest, furnishes the proper measure of recovery. And this holding is well sustained by authority. Beede v. Lamprey, supra; Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 531, 19 L. R. A. 653; Moody v. Whitney, 38 Me. 174, 61 Am. Dec. 239; Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 5 L. R. A. 236; Smith v. Gonder, 22 Ga. 353. The circuit court erred in rejecting the proffered proof.

The third plea was no answer to the complaint, and, if it had been demurred to, would, doubtless, have been adjudged insufficient. Actual possession of land, if thereby is meant possessio pedis, is not required to maintain an action for the conversion of timber severed from the freehold. The legal title, which draws to it constructive possession, is, in the absence of adverse possession by another, sufficient. Cooper v. Watson, 73 Ala. 252. But the plaintiff took issue upon the plea, and the evidence left it a question for the jury whether the plaintiff had actual possession of the land at the time the trees were cut. Though the issue was in law immaterial, the parties made it material by their pleadings; so that, if plaintiff was not in actual possession, as alleged, the plea was established, and defendants were entitled to a verdict. The court therefore erred in refusing the first charge requested by the defendants.

The fourth plea was likewise demurrable. A mistake as to boundaries and an honest belief as to ownership would constitute no defense to the action, although it might affect the amount of recovery. There is, however, no evidence in the record that the defendants were engaged in cutting trees on adjacent lands, nor that they cut the trees for whose conversion the suit was brought. The cutting was done by one Brewer, who sold the logs to the defendants. In other words, the fourth plea was not proved.

Before another trial, these insufficient pleas should be eliminated by a demurrer. Cases ought not to be tried on false issues. No good reason can be seen for filing special pleas containing averments of facts that may be availed of under the general issue; and the practice of complicating and confusing a case with numerous unnecessary special pleas, upon which parties are often led, in the hurry of a trial, to take issue to the detriment of the right of the cause, ought not to be pursued.

The court did not err in refusing the affirmative charge to the defendants.

We need not comment particularly on the charge requested by the defendants upon the measure of damages, as what we have already said upon that subject will enable the circuit court to declare properly the law on another trial.

For the error in rejecting the evidence designed to mitigate the damages, and in refusing said charge, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Calhoun County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the closing of a certain street in the town of Jacksonville. Affirmed

The bill alleged that Mrs. Wier owned a parcel of land in the town of Jacksonville; that the Jacksonville Mining & Manufacturing Company owned lands adjoining; that the corporation platted its land showing an avenue named Quill avenue an extension of which would run through the lands of Mrs. Wier; that Mrs. Wier joined in an agreement to extend the avenue through her land; that Mr. Wier acquiesced in the dedication and that plaintiff in reliance on the dedication built a store house with reference to Quill avenue; that the Wiers were erecting a fence across the avenue which would be of great, special, and irreparable damage to plaintiff; that Mr. Wier was the general agent of his wife in the management of her lands and that he platted the same showing Quill avenue on the map with her knowledge and acquiescence; and that he entered into the written agreement which he signed dedicating the street to the public.

Head, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under general principles of equity jurisprudence, uncontrolled by statute, a married woman, in respect of her separate estate, was regarded as a feme sole. She could dispose of, charge, or incumber it in like manner as if she rested under no marital disability. There being no other trustee, her husband was regarded as the dry holder of the legal title, while she held the entire beneficial interest, subject to her own unlimited control and disposition. When not acting under the actual or implied coercion of the husband, she could bind the estate by acts in pais amounting to an equitable estoppel. Drake v. Glover, 30 Ala. 382 And she could, by such acts, dedicate her lands to public use. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 399. A prime question now presented is whether she can, by acts and conduct in pais, dedicate to public use land which is made a separate estate in her by the statutes of Alabama. As is well known, the land in question of Mrs. Wier (which, it must be presumed, in the absence of contrary averment, was acquired not under a conveyance excluding the marital rights of the husband) would not, in the absence of legislation, have constituted property belonging to her. If it belonged to her at the time of the marriage, or was afterwards acquired, it would, at common law, eo instanti the marriage or its acquisition, have vested in the husband for the joint lives of himself and wife, and, he surviving her, for his life as tenant by the curtesy, the other conditions of curtesy being present. So that we see at once that Mrs. Wier's ownership of such land is purely the creation of the statute, and, of consequence, she takes just such an estate as the grace of the statute confers. If the statute which creates and confers the estate imposes limitations or restrictions upon her powers over it, she takes the estate cum onere such limitations or restrictions. Recurring to our legislation on the subject, we see that all equitable separate estates, such as we have said the wife could have disposed of or charged in equity as a feme sole, have been abolished, with the single exception of estates where the legal title is vested in an active trustee for the use of the wife; and all such abolished equitable estates, and all other estates coming to the wife, which, as we have said, would have vested in the husband at common law, are created and converted by the statute into legal, separate estates of the wife, freed from all title, interest, or control on the part of the husband. We see, further, that by the same legislation certain limitations and restrictions are attached to or imposed upon the estates so created, prominent among which is the provision that her real property shall not be disposed of (save in specified contingencies) except by the joint deed of the husband and wife. This provision substantially obtained in our former married woman's law, so long in force, and frequently became the subject of judicial consideration in this court; and in our adjudications it was well settled that a married woman could not dispose of her statutory separate estate by way of equitable estoppel; that she was confined to the mode of disposition prescribed by the statute, which was by the joint deed, in writing, of herself and husband. Canty v. Sanderford, 37 Ala. 91; Wilder v. Wilder, 89 Ala. 414, 9 L. R. A. 97; Steiner Bros. v. Tranum, 98 Ala. 315, and cases therein cited; Curry v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (Ala.) 18 So. 328, explaining Wilder v. Wilder, supra. She may be devested of title by the adverse possession of her lands by another, under the statute of limitations. Code, § 2624. What effect might be produced upon her estate by actual fraud committed by the wife is not now for our consideration. Nor have we any reference to judicial sales of her estate, in the enforcement of contracts which she may lawfully make, nor to the subjection of her lands under the right of eminent domain. Dedications of land to public uses, not effected by statute or grant, and where private rights have been acquired, as alleged in the present case, operate upon the principle of estoppel in pais, or, as it is termed, "equitable estoppel." It arises from the conduct of the owner, including his spoken or written words, his positive acts, and his silence or negative omission to act when he should, naturally inducing many persons to purchase property, expend money, or otherwise alter their conditions, to their detriment. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 802; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 410, notes; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70. The conclusion, then, is irresistible that a married woman cannot devest herself of her statutory real estate by dedicating it to public use, except by the joint deed of herself and husband, executed as the statute prescribes, or, perhaps, by a statutory dedication under the act of 1887 (Acts 1886–87, p. 93). Fettered by law with the disabilities we have mentioned, the public and individuals dealing with her in reference to her lands do so with knowledge of such disabilities, and will not be heard to invoke against her an estoppel which the statute, in effect, declares she cannot create. The chancellor committed no error in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the bill for want of equity.

Affirmed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County enjoining them from issuing liquor licenses. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Q. Ward for appellants.

Messrs. Blanton & Berry for appellee.

Hazelrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pursuant to the provisions of what is known as the "local option law" of August 6, 1892, a vote in the town of Berry, in Harrison county, was taken on January 31, 1894, and resulted in favor of the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors. When the county judge was about to direct the certificate of the election officers to be entered of record, and the trustees of the town were accordingly about to grant licenses, the appellees, certain citizens of the town, instituted this suit to prevent such action on the part of these officials. The chief point relied on in the petition for injunction is that the law under which the election was held was not enacted by the general assembly in the manner required by the Constitution; the allegation on that behalf being, in effect, that, on the final passage in the Senate of the bill as amended in the other House, the vote was not taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal, as required by § 46 of the Constitution. A consideration of other points relied on will be deferred until after disposition of the principal question.

NOTE.—For analysis of the numerous cases respecting the conclusiveness of an enrolled bill, see note to State, Reed, v. Jones (Wash.) 23 L. R. A. 340.

It is conceded that the bill, properly enrolled, was signed by the presiding officer of each of the two Houses, and signed and approved by the governor. The question is, Can a law thus promulgated be impeached by reference to the journals of either House? Different answers have been given to this inquiry in various courts of last resort in this country, but in this state it remains substantially unanswered; for, whatever may be said of the argument of the question in the World's Fair Case (Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Mgrs. of World's Columbian Exposition, 93 Ky. 537, 18 L. R. A. 536), we are not to take the case as decisive of that which it expressly disclaims to decide. After a discussion tending, it may be admitted, to the conclusion that such an impeachment might be had, the majority opinion yet determines it to be unnecessary to decide the question, and the plaintiffs, seeking to recover under a law sought to be so impeached, were there denied relief on grounds not pertinent to this inquiry. It is to be observed, at the outset, that this is not a case where the enrolled bill is supposed to be in any wise different from the bill actually adopted by the legislative body. It is not a dispute over contents. Such a question is presented in many of the cases. Thus, in Field v. Clark (1892) 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, the allegation was that a section of the bill as it actually passed was not in the enrolled bill as authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers and deposited with the secretary of state. And so in State v. Chester (1893) 39 S. C. 307, the contention was that the original bill which was sent from the Senate to the other House was altered by the speaker of the House of Representatives at the time or after it passed that House, and amended as he saw fit, when the journals of the House showed no such alterations. These cases, and we note them here as samples of many others to the same effect, hold that the official attestation of the presiding officers of the legislative body and of the executive are conclusive that an act so authenticated is the very act passed by the body, and leave undetermined, in express terms at least, the further question whether an act may be impeached if the journals fail to show that which the Constitution expressly requires them to show, such as that the bill was passed by a yea and nay vote. An examination of these cases, however, shows that the argument against the use of the journals to show that the bill was not the same as that actually adopted is quite conclusive against their use to show the absence of the steps contemplated by the organic law. And we may observe, in this connection, it would be strange if it were otherwise. For why should the journals, if deemed capable of shedding light on any question touching the bill, be rejected as evidence affecting the substance,—the very bill itself,—and held competent to affect the mere steps in the process of passing it? Indeed, does there not seem to be stronger reason for seizing hold of the journals to expose the fraud of promulgating as valid a law which had in fact never passed at all, than for using them to undermine a law because of flaws in the steps taken during its passage? Manifestly, therefore, the case of Field v. Clark and the numerous decisions of the state courts which have gone to the extent—and no further, because the particular case did not demand it—of holding the journals incompetent to declare the enrolled bill not to be the very one adopted by the legislative body, must be classed, with a few exceptions, along with the authorities holding that the verity of the enrolled bill, when duly certified and authenticated by the presiding officers, is absolute and conclusive. So construing these cases, it becomes palpable that the overwhelming weight of authority is against the impeachment of the enrolled bill by the journals, whether in a matter affecting the contents of the bill, or merely the regularity of the steps taken in its passage.

When we look to the argument, much may be said on either side of the question, and we shall content ourselves with suggesting only a few of the controlling reasons for our opinion. In the first place, no court can begin its scrutiny of the manner in which the legislative department may have performed the details of its work, as shown by its daily journals, without a sense of assumed superiority, or without seeming to arrogate to itself a supervisory power wholly inconsistent with the fundamental truth that the departments are equal and independent in their respective spheres. Surely must the passing of bills, and all the accompanying minutiæ, be exclusively legislative processes. Courts do not make laws, or pass bills; and the various steps required by the organic law to be taken seem, in the nature of things, to call for the exercise of legislative, and not judicial, functions. The judiciary, at every step of its investigation into the journals of a legislative body, must find itself confronted with the embarrassing question, How is it that the courts have come to be the exclusive guardians of those mandatory provisions of the Constitution which direct the legislature only how to transact its business? The answer must be more embarrassing, because such a thing cannot be, except on the assumption that the courts must regard themselves as alone competent for such oversight. It is to be admitted that, unless the constitutional mandate is followed, "no bill can become a law." The Constitution so says. But the question remains, What shall be taken by the courts as the basis of judicial knowledge? Must they look to the journals, and accept as conclusive the hasty memoranda of the clerk or his assistant, or shall they assume that the legislature obeyed the Constitution, and accept as conclusive the certifications of its presiding officers? That the act or successive acts of some agency, somewhere or somehow, must be held conclusive, is entirely evident, unless we open the doors to all competent proof, including that of the member on the floor,—an absurdity not to be thought of. The result is we must accept as conclusive either the entries of the clerk in the journals or the more deliberate acts of the presiding officers. It must be conceded, on all sides, that at least some of the directions of the Constitution, prescribing steps to be taken in the passage of a bill, are addressed primarily, if not exclusively, to the legislature. Thus, no bill shall be considered for final passage unless the same has been reported by a committee and printed for the use of the members. Every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House. Sec. 46. And so, before the presiding officer of each House shall have affixed his signature to any bill, he shall suspend all other business, declare that such bill will now be read, and that he will sign the same to the end that it may become a law. The bill shall then be read at length, and compared, and if correctly enrolled, the presiding officer, in the presence of the House, in open session, and before any other business is entertained, shall affix his signature, which fact shall be noted in the journal, and the bill immediately sent to the other House. When it reaches the other House, the presiding officer thereof shall immediately suspend all other business, announce the reception of the bill, and the same proceeding shall thereupon be observed in every respect as in the House in which it was first signed. And thereupon the clerk of the latter House shall immediately present the same to the governor for his signature and approval. Section 56.

Can it be said that a statute has not become a law if the journals show it was not reported by a committee, or printed for the use of the members, or read at length on three different days, or was signed by the presiding officer without a suspension of all other business, and when no entry appears in the journal noting such signature? At least some of these steps are specially required to be entered in the journal, and nearly all of them ought to appear there, if the Houses keep a journal of their proceedings as required by § 40 of the Constitution. In some of the courts, where the journals are held to be competent evidence to impeach the enrolled bill, it is said that, where those records are merely silent, the presumption is absolute that the required steps were in fact taken. This seems to us hardly logical. If the validity of a law is to rest at all on the entries in the journals, it seems to us, when there is a total absence of evidence that a necessary step has been taken, the superstructure—the law—thus built up without a foundation must fall. Those courts assume that the failure of the clerk to make the entry, and in this violate the Constitution requiring the entry to be made, was an oversight or mistake, and treat the entry as made, supplying the omission; and yet they are not willing to assume it to be a mistake or mere misapprehension of the inferior officer if an entry is made showing steps taken not in conformity with the constitutional requirements. Even if resort is had to the journals, it would seem as consistent to overlook the sins of commission by the clerk, and treat his entry showing a violation of the Constitution as not true, as to overlook his sins of omission, and supply the defects in his record. To avoid the necessity of resorting to these fine spun distinctions, we are convinced that the consistent and safe rule is to assume that the legislature, in obedience to the Constitution, has taken the steps required by that instrument in the passage of every law attested by the signatures of its presiding officers, the journals to the contrary notwithstanding. The enrolled bill, so attested and signed, and approved by the executive, is easy of access and inspection; but what shall we say of the journals? At the session at which the law now under consideration was adopted, those records consist of over 4,000 pages. They seem to have been hurriedly and imperfectly indexed, as in the nature of things they must ever be. The assiduous lawyer who plods through these volumes may fail to find the evidence of an important step required by the Constitution to support a statute which has been promulgated as the law of the land, and the court in his case declares as a matter of fact that the prima facie law so promulgated is not in fact the law. In an adjoining circuit the court is more fortunate, and the missing step is found, or the erroneous entry is found corrected elsewhere in the record. So the law is upheld. And this confusing result will be reached, not because the law depends on the testimony or the pleadings in any given case, for the courts must take judicial notice of the journals, if they are controlling, as well as of the signatures of the presiding officers, if these are to be held conclusive; but the confusion comes from the nature of the record to be inspected. This is usually prepared by the subordinate officers, hurriedly, amidst the excitement and confusion incident to legislative bodies, and with small concern for those details which are to become so important if the record is to be subjected to judicial scrutiny.

But, it is said, since the Constitution requires the journals to be kept, it must be because they are to be used as evidence of legislative compliance or noncompliance with the constitutional requirements. We can see, however, much use for these journals other than the one suggested. Besides being necessary for the conduct of the business, it is to be remembered that our government is a representative one, and the journals show the respective parts borne by each representative in the enactment of the laws and the conduct of the public business. Responsibility cannot be shifted or made to rest on the body as a whole. Again, we know that the enrollment of bills receives careful attention at the hands of special committees for that purpose. It is the final act of the body, the climax of the work before the finishing hand of the presiding officer sets his approval thereto. It receives and merits attention for that reason, and there is small room for imposition or fraud. The enrolled act is wellnigh necessarily the very act passed by the body. But the chances of mistake are very great in the make-up of the journals as they are ordinarily kept; and, if it be understood that the enrolled bill may be impeached by them, the chances of fraud are likewise great. They are usually read from loose sheets or hurriedly made memoranda, and are approved with slight attention, and are then passed to the journal clerk or some copyist to be transcribed formally in the journal. They receive, usually, no further consideration at the hands of the body. In after years, the careless omission of a name on the affirmative side of a law requiring a certain number of votes is made the basis of a judicial finding that the law has not been enacted by a constitutional majority. This feature is well put in the recent case of State v Jones (1893) 6 Wash. 468, where it is said: "Unless the method of keeping journals should at once be revolutionized, and so much attention be paid to them that they will be made to absolutely represent all the doings of the body to such an extent as to very much prolong the sessions of the legislature, the sanctity of legislative enactments will be entirely dependent upon the carefulness and good faith of some copyist employed by the legislature at a few dollars a day." The same point is thus stated by Justice Harlan in Field v. Clark: "The evils that may result from the recognition of the principle that an enrolled act, in the custody of the secretary of state, attested by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, and the approval of the President, is conclusive evidence that it was passed by Congress, according to the forms of the Constitution, would be far less than those that would certainly result from a rule making the validity of congressional enactments depend upon the manner in which the journals of the respective Houses are kept by the subordinate officers charged with the duty of keeping them."

It is said, however, that such a conclusion results in leaving the legislative department free to nullify the plain provisions of the Constitution, and refuse to comply with the formalities required by that instrument in the enactment of the laws. If this is true, it does not follow that the courts may interfere with the processes of the legislature in that respect. If that department fails or refuses to do the bidding of the Constitution, it is responsible to the people, and not to the courts. Besides, an assumption that it will so fail or refuse is not to be made the basis of judicial action. To the argument that, if the authenticated roll is conclusive before the courts, then less than a quorum of each House may, by the aid of corrupt presiding officers, impose laws upon the state in defiance of the inhibition of the Constitution, the supreme court of Indiana, in Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710, responded thus: "It must be admitted that the consequence stated would be possible. Public authority and political power must, of necessity, be confided to officers who, being human, may violate the trusts reposed in them. This, perhaps cannot be avoided absolutely. But it applies also to all human agencies. It is not fit that the judiciary should claim for itself a purity beyond others, nor has it been able at all times with truth to say that its high places have not been disgraced. The framers of our government have not constituted it with faculties to supervise co-ordinate departments, and correct or prevent abuses of their authority. It cannot authenticate a statute; that power does not belong to it; nor can it keep the legislative journal. It ascertains the statute law by looking at its authentication, and then its function is merely to expound and administer it. . . . Nor is there any great force in the argument, which seems to be regarded as of weight by some American courts, that some important provisions of the Constitution would be a dead letter if inquiry may not be made by the courts beyond the rolls. This argument overlooks the fact that legislators are sworn to support the Constitution, or else it assumes that they will wilfully violate that oath. It is neither modest nor just for judges thus to impeach the integrity of another department of government, and to claim that the judiciary only will be faithful to its obligation." From every point of reason, therefore, we are convinced that the enrolled bill, when attested by the presiding officers as the law requires, must be accepted by the courts as the very bill adopted by the legislature, and that its mode of enactment was in conformity to all constitutional requirements. When so authenticated, it imports absolute verity, and is unimpeached by the journals. When we look to the authorities, we find, as indicated before, a great diversity of opinion. They are too numerous to be reviewed here. We notice, however, that the more recent cases are adopting the English rule, and holding the enrolled bill conclusive. In several of the cases, where the courts felt constrained to follow their former rulings holding the journals competent, regret is expressed that a different rule had not prevailed. State v. Moore, 37 Neb. 13. Others express a doubt whether it is the better rule, and in South Carolina the court overrules its former decisions, and adopts the views expressed in Field v. Clark. State v. Chester, 39 S. C. 307. In the recent case of Carr v. Coke (1895) 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 737, the question was considered as one of new impression in that state, and after what seems to us a very satisfactory course of reasoning, and a review of the principal authorities, the conclusion was reached that, "when the legislature has solemnly certified to a fact,—that is, to the passage and ratification of an act which is within its own sphere,"—the judiciary will not be permitted "to inquire into or dispute that certification." To the same effect is the case of Harwood v. Wentworth (Ariz.) 42 Pac. 1028. The opinion in this case is well considered, and the doctrine restated on principle and authority. See also the recent cases of Lyons v. Woods, 153 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 854; State, Sutherland, v. Nye (Nev.) 42 Pac. 866; Hunt v. Wright, 70 Miss. 298; Hollingsworth v. Thompson, 45 La. Ann. 222; State, Benton County, v. Boice, 140 Ind. 512, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 141 Ind. 281. The older authorities are found collated in the notes to Field v. Clark, and the Washington and North Carolina cases cited, and need not be further discussed.

Regarding, therefore, the act of August, 1892, as constitutionally enacted, it is yet insisted by the appellees that as, prior to January 31, 1894, when the vote in the town of Berry was taken, a special prohibitory law (1884) was in force in the magisterial precinct that included the town, therefore no vote in the town alone could undo the vote of the entire precinct, and that the same subdivision which voted out the sale must act to vote it in. The case of Com. v. King, 86 Ky. 436, is relied on to support this contention. But in that case the right claimed by the town to take a separate vote was confessedly derived from the same law which conferred a similar right on the precinct which included the town. The power given each subdivision was from the same source, and was simultaneously conferred. Hence, the conclusion was reached that no greater, but equal, power was conferred on each, and when the whole acted under the general law the part could not undo what it had done. But here we have a new political division created, and new powers conferred. A complete, separate entity is created by a new charter of the town of Berry, and the trustees thereof given exclusive control of the question at hand, except they cannot grant license, when forbidden by a previous law, until the law is changed. And as showing that such a change might be had, and how, we have only to quote a provision of the charter on that subject adopted in July, 1893, to wit: "That in any town of the sixth class, in which the question as to whether spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors might or should be sold . . . shall hereafter be submitted to the voters thereof, and the majority of votes cast thereat shall be in favor of the sale of such liquors therein, then the said board of trustees of such town shall have no right, power, privilege, or discretion to refuse to grant licenses to sell such liquors therein until another election is held therein as provided by general laws, and a majority of the voters of that town have voted against the sale of such liquors." Ky. Stat. § 3704, subs. 4. A vote in the new territory was therefore clearly contemplated and authorized by this charter, and, moreover, the general law—the local option law—was adopted, to the end that consistent and uniform laws should prevail everywhere, in place of these various and irregular special acts. Such was our conclusion in the recent cases of Brown v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 216, and McTigue v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1418. Of course, the same precinct in which the vote was originally taken can never have another vote taken. It is well known that both the magisterial and voting precincts of 1884 have long since been obliterated, and new ones erected (Ky. Stat. §§ 1078, 1443); and it is even doubtful if a special act of the legislature could be constitutionally enacted, as, where a general law can be made applicable, a special one should not be enacted.

Nor do we find any difficulty in determining the appellants to have been the trustees of the town of Berry at the time of the institution of this suit. They had been regularly elected, under the old charter, for one year from April, 1893; and, while § 167 of the Constitution provided for a termination of their offices at the November election, 1893, it provided that the old officers should yet hold until their successors should be elected and qualified. In Johnson v. Wilson, 95 Ky. 415, the successor of the old officer was in fact elected at the November election, 1893, and, of course the old officer was not entitled to hold thereafter. In answer to his contention that he might so hold over, we said: "It is true he was to hold until the general election in November, 1893, and until his successor was elected and qualified; but this is the usual method provided to prevent a vacancy, when, from some unforeseen circumstance, no election has been held at the regular time, or some time must elapse until the succeeding officer shall qualify and be inducted into the office." Here there was no election held in the town of Berry in November, 1893, and, under the express terms of the Constitution, the appellants were entitled to hold over, and were therefore not usurpers, as contended by appellees. The act of March, 1894 (Ky. Stat. § 3672), was passed to cure any possible doubt of the legality of the acting trustees of towns of the sixth class arising out of the failure of many of those towns to elect trustees in November, 1893, and was not enacted, as contended by counsel, in recognition of the alleged fact that there were vacancies in those offices, or that the acts of the holdovers were void. Such a legislative declaration, if made, would have been inoperative, as an unauthorized interference with the functions of the judiciary in the exercise of its exclusive right to interpret the laws.

We conclude, therefore, that upon none of the grounds relied on are the appellees entitled to the relief granted by the perpetuation of the injunction, and the judgment below is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

J. S. McTIGHE et al.
v.
MACON CONSTRUCTION COMPANY et al.,
Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, Intervener.

(94 Ga. 306.)

*1. There being in force a general law for the incorporation of railroad companies, if the subsequent special charters of the two railroad companies involved in this litigation were unconstitutional, and therefore wholly void, each of said companies was, nevertheless, a corporation de facto, and, as such, could acquire and own property, and would be bound to its creditors by all acts which would have bound it had it been duly incorporated under the general law. Bonds issued by it, and deeds or mortgages made to secure the same, are enforceable to the same extent they would be if no special charter had been granted, and the company had been organized as a corporation in the method prescribed by the general law, and such bonds, deeds, and mortgages had been thereafter executed; and any person making claim upon the assets of one of these corporations de facto, whether as its own creditor directly, or as a creditor of such creditor or of a stockholder, sustains the same relation to it in respect to such claim as would be sustained under like circumstances were it a corporation de jure.

2. A corporation created under the general law of this state for incorporating railroad companies can bind by mortgage or trust deed, executed to secure bonds issued by it to provide funds for constructing its railroad, future acquired property, as well as property owned by it at the time of the execution of the instrument. This being so, a corporation de facto can do the like.

3. A loan of $850 for the term of forty years is not rendered usurious by the lender taking from the borrower his bond for $1,000, bearing interest on that principal at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, although the bond contained a stipulation that, after ninety days' default upon any one of the instalments of interest, the NOTE.—Jurisdiction to order foreclosure sale of railroad in different states.

The authorities all seem to agree that if a court has jurisdiction of the mortgagor it may compel a sale of the entire property although it extends into several states, but that any attempted sale by an officer of the court unaccompanied by a conveyance by the owner will be of no avail as to property out of the jurisdiction of the court.

A court which has jurisdiction of the mortgagors and trustees in a railroad mortgage may decree a sale of the road although a portion of it extends into another state. Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 148; Brown v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 73 Md. 567; Union Trust Co. v. Olmstead, 102 N. Y. 729.

Of the propriety of a foreclosure in one court operating upon an entire property running through several states, and of the validity of a sale made in pursuance of that foreclosure and the completeness of the title that will pass by such sale, there can be now no longer any question. In Muller v. Dows that question was put at rest. Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 620.

The decree is made effective by means of the power which the court has over the defendants. Boston Safe-Deposit & T. Co. v. Bankers' & M. Teleg. Co. 36 Fed. Rep. 288.

It is a principle firmly established that equity as it acts primarily in personam and not merely in rem may, where a person against whom relief is sought is within the jurisdiction, make a decree upon the ground of a contract or an equity subsisting between the parties respecting property situated out of the jurisdiction. Mead v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 45 Conn. 199.

A court is not limited to its territorial jurisdiction in ordering a sale of property under a mortgage where it has jurisdiction of the parties. Randolph v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 11 Phila. 502.

A railroad company which has constructed part of its road through another state and has mortgaged its rights in the whole road can be authorized or compelled to sell whatever interest of the corporation will pass under the terms of the mortgage. McElrath v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. 55 Pa. 189.

In Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. 12 S. C. 314, it was held that where a state court attempts to decree a foreclosure sale of a railroad extending into another state it should make the sale subject to such liens on the property as existed in the other state.

No title will be conveyed as to property in other states by a sale by an officer appointed by the court for the purpose of making the sale. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Bankers & M. Teleg. Co. 44 Hun, 400.

The decree of sale followed by a sale by a receiver will not affect the title in another state. There must be a conveyance by the owner. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Postal Teleg. Co. 55 Conn. 334.

There are two cases in which expressions used and the action of the courts seem to conflict with the above decisions. But there was probably no intention of passing upon the question of the method of effecting the sale. And the courts would doubtless have required a conveyance by the owner in aid of the title.

In one of the cases it was held that where corporations of three states are consolidated into one a court of equity in foreclosing a consolidated mortgage upon the entire property has jurisdiction to sell all the property in all the states. Blackburn v. Selma, M. & M. R. Co. 2 Flipp. 525.

Muller v. Dows, supra, was cited as authority for that proposition. So the decision cannot be regarded as going further than that case would warrant.

In Wilmer v. Atlanta & R. Air Line R. Co. 2 Woods, C. C. 447, the court decreed a sale of the entire road although it extended into another state, upon the ground that to cut up a railroad into pieces for the purpose of sale would result in too much injury, and that therefore it should not be done. But there is no discussion of the power of the court to order the sale.

Of course courts in the separate states may aid each other in the foreclosure if such course seems desirable. And in some cases such proceeding might be necessary.

In Rome & D. R. Co. v. Sibert, 97 Ala. 393, the sale was made under a decree made by the courts of the two states into which the railroad extended.

H. P. F.

whole of the principal should then become due and payable; it not being stipulated that in this event the lender was not to account for any interest received, whether by discount or payment, over and above 8 per cent per annum on the principal actually loaned, and it not appearing that there was any device or contrivance to cover up usury, or any intent or expectation that default would be made in the payment of interest before the expiration of the full term of forty years. Nor would it matter that the bonds were not, in fact, delivered and the money received thereon till after a lapse of thirty-nine days or less from the date when the bonds began to bear interest at the 6 per cent rate.

4. Where a railroad forming a continuous line, and located partly in this state and partly in an adjoining state, is mortgaged by a corporation (whether de facto or de jure) of which the courts of this state have jurisdiction, the mortgage consisting of a trust deed made to secure bonds issued by the corporation, the superior court of the county in this state having jurisdiction over the corporation may, in the exercise of its equitable powers, make a decree foreclosing the mortgage as to the corporate property embraced in it situate in both states, and may effectuate the decree by directing a sale of the whole property and the execution of a proper conveyance to the purchaser by the receiver, the trustee, and the mortgagor. And if the fact be that the adjoining state has incorporated a company which has been consolidated under the forms of law with a corporation (de facto or de jure) of this state, and that this consolidated company executed the mortgage and is really the party before the court as the mortgagor, the truth of the case in this respect is admissible in evidence, and the jurisdiction is the same in all respects over the consolidated company as it would be over a corporation created exclusively under the laws of this state.

(August 20, 1894.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County, to review a judgment rendered in favor of the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company as intervener in a creditors' bill by McTighe et al., to reach assets of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company which established bonds secured by mortgages held by intervener as valid liens on the road. Affirmed.

The official report set out the following facts:

This litigation was begun by petition in the nature of a creditors' bill filed by J. S. McTighe & Co. against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company, the Macon Construction Company, and others, under which petition a receiver of the defendant companies was appointed. Numerous interventions were filed, among them that of the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, trustee for the bondholders of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company, asking for foreclosure of the mortgages given to secure the bonds. It was agreed that this intervention was to be segregated from the main case and from the other interventions, and be tried separately. Said railroad and construction companies filed several pleas, which were stricken on demurrer of the intervener. McTighe & Co. filed an amendment to their petition, attacking the charter of the railroad company, on the ground that it was a special enactment of the legislature after the passage of the general act for the incorporation of railroads, and was void, and that the bonds and mortgages to secure them, made by the railroad company, and held by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, were likewise void. It was alleged that the construction company was the real owner of the railroad and its property; and that McTighe & Co. had never dealt with the railroad company, but all their dealing had been with the construction company, as owner of the road, etc. This amendment was disallowed. The pleas of the construction company were similar to those of the railroad company, with the additional allegation that the former was the owner of all the stock and property of the latter.

These pleas were: (1) The bonds held by intervener as trustee, or by the persons represented by it, and the mortgages sought to be foreclosed, are null and void, and were made without authority of law, the railroad company never having been properly and legally incorporated.

(2) The mortgage sought to be foreclosed was executed when the railroad had been completed for only the first 20 miles from Macon, in the direction of Florida, and had obtained the right of way for the further construction of the road to Valdosta, Ga., and no further. All the property of defendant from Valdosta to the line of the state of Florida, together with the rolling stock belonging to it, was acquired by it after the execution of the mortgage; all said after acquired property, and all property acquired after the execution of the mortgage, is free from the lien of the mortgage, and not covered thereby.

(3) The bonds held by intervener, or the persons represented by it, and the mortgages given to secure them, are infected with usury. The bonds were issued by the railroad company to the holders thereof on July 1, 1887, in the aggregate sum of $3,420,000, payable July 1, 1927, with interest at 7 per cent per annum from date, semiannually, on the 1st days of January and July, the principal indebtedness to become due at the option of said trustee, upon the failure of the railroad company to promptly pay any interest instalment at maturity, after ninety days from such default; while, in point of fact, the holders of the bonds loaned only $2,907,000, but charged and received interest on the entire $3,420,000 at the rate of 7 per cent per annum; it being stipulated in each of the bonds that said interest should be reserved and paid on the face or par value thereof, instead of the amount so actually lent by the holders of the bonds. The mortgages now sought to be foreclosed were given to secure the usurious interest so contracted to be paid, as well as the face or par value of said bonds. Therefore, $513,000 of the aggregate amount called for by the bonds, and secured by the mortgages, together with the interest on the $513,000 from the date of the bonds, which interest is also included in the bonds and mortgages, is usury; and plaintiff's demand should be reduced by the $513,000, together with the interest thereon, and all interest paid on the $513,000 in the past amounting to $189,550. The instruments executed by the railroad company for the purpose of securing the bonds, and in the petition to foreclose termed "mortgages" or "deeds of trust," are in fact deeds attempting to convey to the intervener, as trustee, the absolute title to the property therein described, for securing the payment of the bonds; and, by reason of the above recited facts, the bonds being infected with usury, said deeds or instruments given to secure the payment thereof are absolutely void. Of the bonds held by intervener, or by persons represented by it, 360, for $1,000 principal each, were dated and executed July 1, 1887, and 3,060, for $1,000 principal each, on July 24, 1888; the aggregate principal of all these bonds being $3,420,000. Though these bonds were dated and executed as aforesaid, they were not in fact issued or delivered on said date. The 360 bonds first mentioned were delivered January 19, 1888; and the parties to whom they were so delivered, and who now hold and own them, loaned this defendant on them, and on the deed of trust executed cotemporaneously with them, to secure their payment, $306,000; said loan having been made to this defendant on January 19, 1888, and the interest on the bonds being payable on the 1st days of January and July in each of the years during which they were to run, which interest was represented by coupons attached to the bonds. Interest for nineteen days had accrued on the bonds, according to the tenor thereof, since the maturity of the coupons falling due January 1, 1888, and before said loan was made this defendant. The interest coupons which matured on July 1, 1888, represented the interest on the bonds from January 1, 1888, to July 1, 1888, and included the interest for the nineteen days from January 1 to January 19, 1888. These coupons were paid by this defendant in full, and no deduction was made for the nineteen days; nor was credit for the nineteen days interest allowed or contemplated at the time of the loan on January 19, 1888. This defendant only had the use of the money from January 19, 1888, and paid interest thereon and contracted to pay such interest from January 1, 1888. Defendant contends that the interest for the nineteen days was improperly required of it, as well as the $54,000 taken and reserved as discount in advance, both said sums being interest charged and paid for the first year of each loan, and being usury. The amount of this interest so overcharged was $1,320. Similar claim is made as to the 3,060 bonds of the second issue above mentioned, the amount of interest or discount in advance claimed to have been taken as to these being $459,000, and the amount of interest overcharged, for the time between the date of issue and the date of delivery, being $19,380.

The mortgages or deeds of trust in question, dated January 3 and July 24, 1888, were in evidence. The only material portions of them are the recitals that the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company, a railway corporation under the laws of Georgia, was authorized by act of the legislature to consolidate with any railroad in Florida; that the Macon & Florida Air-Line Company, a railway corporation under the laws of Florida, had like authority to consolidate with any railroad company in or out of Florida; that in pursuance of the unanimous vote of the stockholders of the two railroads, respectively, a consolidation thereof was effected; and that the mortgage or deed of trust was executed by the consolidated company known as the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company in favor of the trustee. There are further recitals as to resolutions of the board of directors, thereafter adopted and confirmed by the stockholders, authorizing the issuance of coupon bonds of $1,000 each, secured by the mortgage or deed of trust covering the railroad from Macon to Palatka, Fla., with all its properties enumerated, etc., and the provision, among others, that, in default of the payment of interest upon any of the bonds for a certain period, the whole principal sum secured by the deed should become due and payable, with the right in the trustee to sell the property under certain regulations, or apply to any court of competent jurisdiction to foreclose the mortgage, etc. The intervener proved, over defendant's objections, that the Macon & Florida Air Line was duly incorporated under the laws of Florida, and that said company and the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company were duly consolidated as one railroad company, operating a railroad from Macon, Ga., to Palatka, Fla.; the objections being that such evidence was irrelevant and illegal, because the court had no jurisdiction over the railroad and other property in Florida, or authority to make any judgment concerning the same.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling questions presented in these cases are indicated in the headnotes. How these questions arose will appear from an examination of the reporter's statement. We have not decided, and will not discuss, whether or not a special charter granted by the general assembly to a railroad company after the passage of the general law for the incorporation of railroad companies is unconstitutional, and therefore void. Among many good reasons which might be stated for pursuing this course, and which would doubtless be accepted as satisfactory, we deem it sufficient to say it is not now necessary to pass upon this question, it not being essential to a proper disposition of the present cases. We wish it distinctly understood, however, that we do not intend in anything which follows to intimate any opinion whatever upon this question; and, if any expression we may use should seem to do so, it must not be so construed.

1. If such a charter is unconstitutional, is not a company organized under it, at least, a de facto corporation, and, as such, capable of making contracts, acquiring and owning property, and of becoming bound to its creditors by all acts which would have been binding upon it had it been duly incorporated under the general law? We entertain no doubt at all, and will presently endeavor to show that this question should be answered in the affirmative; and, if so, it will follow that bonds, deeds, and mortgages executed by the de facto corporation are valid, not only as against the corporation itself, but also as against any one making a claim upon its assets, whether as a creditor directly of the corporation, or as a creditor of its creditors or stockholders. It is too well settled, both upon principle and authority, to require argument, that neither a de facto corporation nor those who recognize and deal directly with it as a corporation will be heard to deny its rightful corporate existence; and there is no good reason for applying a different rule to one claiming assets of a de facto corporation acquired solely in the exercise of corporate functions, but for the assumption of which there would have been no company of any kind, and, of course, no assets. Nor is it at all material whether the claim be made directly or indirectly. Whatever may be the manner in which it is presented, if the assets sought to be reached were in fact assets of a de facto corporation, the very act of making the claim puts the claimant in the same legal attitude as a direct creditor of the corporation; for such claimant has no better rights in the premises than his debtor of whose rights he seeks to get the benefit, and consequently can no more dispute the existence of the corporation than could the latter. So far, therefore, as the parties to this record are concerned, we have only to show that railroad companies operating in Georgia under special legislative charters granted after the passage of the general law referred to are at least corporations de facto.

The fact that this very law was in force at the time the railroad companies involved in the present litigation obtained their special charters makes it absolutely certain that, even if these charters are mere nullities, lawful and valid charters might have been obtained for just such companies. In other words, there was, beyond doubt, legal authority in this state for incorporating railroad companies with substantially the same rights, powers, duties, and liabilities as those specified in the special charters. This is a most important fact; for, where there cannot lawfully be a corporation de jure, there cannot be one de facto. This was distinctly ruled in Evenson v. Ellingson, 67 Wis. 634. "If an organization is completed where there is no law, or an unconstitutional law, authorizing an organization as a corporation," one who contracted with the organization is not estopped from denying its corporate existence. Heaston v. Cincinnati & Ft. W. R. Co. 16 Ind. 276, 79 Am. Dec. 430. See also Snyder v. Studebaker, 19 Ind. 462, 81 Am. Dec. 415, and cases there cited. In St. Louis Colonization Asso. v. Hennessy, 11 Mo. App. 555, it was held that one who had subscribed for stock in a supposed corporation prohibited by the state Constitution was not estopped from denying its lawful existence. "Corporations cannot exist except by force of express law. A society that cannot be incorporated because organized to resist the enforcement of laws, cannot sue in its society name for the collection of a debt." Detroit Schuetzen Bund v. Detroit Agitations Verein, 44 Mich. 313, 38 Am. Rep. 270. "A corporation organized under a void law cannot enforce a mortgage made to it; but if not organized for an unlawful purpose a receiver for it can demand in equity an accounting for the debt purporting to be secured thereby." Burton v Schildbach, 45 Mich. 504. "A corporation de facto cannot exist in the absence of a law authorizing its organization, and in such a case the carrying on of the business in the corporate name is no evidence of user which can be considered in aid of corporate existence." Eaton v. Walker, 76 Mich. 579, 6 L. R. A. 102. In this connection, see also Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968; and Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. ed. 178. One of the headnotes in the latter case is as follows: "An unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed." And, accordingly, it was held that the acts of a person assuming to perform the duties of an office which was created by an unconstitutional law, and therefore having no de jure existence, were utterly void.

We may assume, without further citation of authorities and without attempting any argument on the subject, that where the existence of a corporation of a given kind is positively forbidden by law, or where there is no valid, constitutional law authorizing the creation of such a corporation, it cannot exist, even as a corporation de facto. The rule thus stated does not by any means, however, negative the soundness of the proposition that an organization assuming to be a corporation de jure, but for sufficient reasons not so in fact, may be a corporation de facto when it is of such a character that it could, under existing laws, have full and complete corporate being and powers. The doctrine is thus broadly stated in Snider's Sons' Co. v. Troy, 91 Ala. 224, 11 L. R. A. 515. "A corporation de facto exists when, from irregularity or defect in the organization or Constitution, or from some omission to comply with conditions precedent, a corporation de jure is not created, but there has been a colorable compliance with the requirements of some law under which an association might lawfully be incorporated for the purpose and with the powers assumed and a user of the rights claimed to be conferred by the law; that is when there is an organization with color of law, and the exercise of corporate franchises and functions." In Stout v. Zulick, 48 N. J. L. 601, it is said: "Where it is shown that there is a charter or a law under which a corporation with the powers assumed might lawfully be incorporated, and there is a colorable compliance with the requirements of the charter or law, and a user of the rights claimed under the charter or law, the existence of a corporation de facto is established." The supreme court of Illinois, in McCarthy v. Lavasche, 89 Ill. 270, 31 Am. Rep. 83, held, in substance, that, even where a corporation has been formed under a charter which is unconstitutional and void, the stockholders would be estopped from urging this fact in order to defeat the collection of a bona fide debt against the corporation which a creditor is seeking to enforce under a provision of the charter making the stockholders liable individually. And see Hudson v. Green Hill Seminary Corp. 113 Ill. 618, as to what will constitute proof of the existence of a de facto corporation. "A de facto corporation that by regularity of proceeding might be one de jure can sue and be sued; and a party who contracts with such corporation while it is acting under its de facto organization, is estopped, in a suit on such contract, from denying such organization at the date of the contract." Heaston's Case, supra. The case of East Norway L. N. E. Lutheran Church v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447, is strongly in support of the proposition that there may be a de facto corporation where there is a law under which a corporation of the particular kind might be formed; and the decision seems to have been made irrespective of the question whether, in organizing the corporation, there was an attempt to comply with the requisite legal forms or not. This case also holds that no private person will be allowed to attack collaterally the regularity of the organization of such a corporation. "A party is estopped to deny the existence of a corporation at the time he contracted with it as such, if the corporation could constitutionally exist." Brookville & G. Turnp. Co. v. McCarty, 8 Ind. 392, 65 Am. Dec. 768. In Missouri it has been held that even where a corporation is organized under a special charter, void because of a constitutional provision for incorporation by general law, a private party cannot question its rightful existence when it is recognized by the state, the latter alone being allowed to raise the question. St. Louis Comrs. v. Shields, 62 Mo. 247. We find the following in Central Agri. & M. Asso. v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 70 Ala. 120: "When an association of persons is formed in the exercise and user of corporate franchises, under color of legal organization, their existence as a corporation cannot be inquired into collaterally, if the state acquiesces in the usurpation, individuals cannot complain." The general rule that private persons will not be allowed to attack collaterally the validity of a de facto corporation is supported by many authorities, among which may be mentioned 7 Atl. 362, and cases there cited in note; Duggan v. Colorado Mortg. & I. Co. 11 Colo. 113, and cases cited; Tar River Nav. Co. v. Neal, 3 Hawks, 520; Hasselman v. United States Mortg. Co. 97 Ind. 365, and authorities cited.

In addition to the numerous cases above noticed, we have examined a very large number of others, decided in states other than our own, many of which are more or less pertinent to the question in hand. In some, there are expressions and rulings not entirely in harmony with the conclusion we have reached, but we think we have settled upon and announced the true law. Before concluding this division of the present opinion, we will briefly refer to a few of our own cases which support the doctrine here laid down. McDougald v. Bellamy, 18 Ga. 411, recognizes the rule that a corporation, though unlawfully organized, is so far a valid corporation as to make it liable to creditors for its own acts. See also Georgia Ice Co. v. Porter, 70 Ga. 637. In Planters' & M. Bank v. Padgett, 69 Ga. 159, it was held that, although a charter granted by the superior court to a manufacturing company was void, one who dealt with the company as a corporation could not deny its corporate existence. Where one corporation has dealt with another company as a corporation, recognizing it as such, the first corporation is estopped from denying the existence of the second. Imboden v. Etowah & B. B. & H. H. Min. Co. 70 Ga. 86. On page 107, Chief Justice Jackson says: "This court, as, indeed, all civilized courts, has ruled that such recognition of a being—even of an artificial being—will stop the mouth of any other being, natural or artificial, from denying, in a case growing out of such recognition, that the being thus recognized ever had being." See, in this connection, Lester v. Georgia Car & N. R. Co. 90 Ga. 802.

Our decision is not based upon the idea that the organization of these railroad companies under unconstitutional charters would make them de facto corporations, but upon the idea that the purpose for which they were organized being lawful and proper, if they had obtained charters under the general law, and organized under them, which they might have done, they would in substance have done what they actually did; that is they would have observed about the same forms and requirements in the one case as in the other. They undoubtedly attempted to organize according to some law, and did not set up to be corporations without pretense of legal authority. If the laws under which they proceeded were not good, they may, in our judgment, avail themselves of the existence of the general law on our statute book, and of its terms at least so far as to enable them to be regarded as de facto corporations, because they have done practically what that general law required, though not actually following it nor professing to do so.

2. No question was raised as to the power of either of the railroad companies, under its special charter, to embrace in a mortgage property acquired after the execution of the mortgage. The right to mortgage "future acquired property" was denied solely on the ground that these companies, being without legal charters, had no charter power for so doing, and that there was no other source from which such right could be lawfully derived. While it is true that § 1954 of the Code in effect restricts (except as to stocks of goods or other things in bulk, but changing in specifics) the property which a mortgage may embrace to that "in possession, or to which the mortgagor has the right of possession," it is also true that the general law of this state for incorporating railroad companies expressly provides that a company created thereunder may, by mortgage or trust deed executed to secure bonds issued to provide funds for constructing its railroad, bind property acquired after the execution of the instrument. If we have succeeded in showing that these railroad companies, supposing their special charters to be void, are de facto corporations, because of the existence of the general law, it would seem that they could make any contracts authorized by that law, and become bound by such contracts to those with whom the same were made. As a practical proposition, it is well known that most, if not all, of the railroads of any length in the United States which have been built for years past, have been constructed by issuing in advance bonds upon their entire lines, including the unbuilt portions, as well as those already constructed, with mortgages to secure the bonds covering the whole. If a de facto railroad company is a corporation for any purpose at all, it ought, on general principles, to have the power to mortgage "future acquired property;" and this seems to be the doctrine very generally recognized by the courts. Upon this question, see Wright v. Bircher, 72 Mo. 179, 37 Am. Rep. 433; Quincy v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 94 Ill. 537; Wade v. Chicago, S. & St. L. R. Co. 149 U. S. 327, 37 L. ed. 755; Williams v. Winsor, 12 R. I. 9; Branch v. Atlantic & G. R. Co. 3 Woods, C. C. 481, Fed. Cas. No. 1,807; Seymour v. Canandaigua & N. F. R. Co. 25 Barb. 284; Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191. And these citations might be indefinitely multiplied.

3. The third headnote expresses the views we entertain of the usury question presented. A calculation will show that if the bonds ran to full maturity, as contemplated, the lender of the money would not receive, in the aggregate, as much as 8 per cent per annum for the use of the money, although at the beginning he put out on each bond only $850 and at the end received $1,000. The $150 added to the 6 per cent interest annually received would not amount to as much as 8 per cent per annum on $850 for the full term. That the bonds, by their terms, bore interest from a date previous to their delivery, makes no difference, because, notwithstanding this fact, the gross amount of interest for the full term would not have been equal to 8 per cent per annum. So the original contract, if the bonds ran forty years, was not usurious; and it does not appear that they contained any stipulation which would prevent a fair and legal adjustment of the interest between the parties in case the bonds became due earlier, because of the default in paying interest. Nor does it appear that, in providing for the maturity of the bonds in case of such default, there was any device or contrivance to cover up usury. The above is applicable if the railroad company issued the bonds and borrowed money directly on them. If that company delivered the bonds to the construction company unde a contract with it, the latter, of course, had a right to sell them at any discount it pleased, and there would be no usury in such a transaction.

4. Had the decree foreclosing the mortgage on the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company, and directing a sale of all its property in both states, been made by a court of the United States, its validity could hardly be doubted. The following Federal cases are conclusive upon this question, and we are confident there are others to the same effect: Randolph v. Wilmington & R. R. Co. 11 Phila. 502, Fed. Cas. No. 11,563; Blackburn v. Selma M. & M. R. Co. 2 Flipp. 525, Fed. Cas. No. 1,467; Wilmer v. Atlanta & R. Air Line R. Co. 2 Woods, C. C. 409, Fed. Cas. No. 17,775; Id. 2 Woods, C. C. 447, Fed. Cas. No. 17,776; Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207. The opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in the case last cited is so clear and pertinent that we feel justified in making copious extracts from it: "If such a foreclosure and sale cannot be made of a railroad which crosses a state line and is within two states, when the entire line is subject to one mortgage, it is certainly to be regretted, and to hold that it cannot be would be disastrous, not only to the companies that own the road, but to the holders of bonds secured by the mortgage. Multitudes of bridges span navigable streams in the United States, streams that are boundaries of two states. These bridges are often mortgaged. Can it be that they cannot be sold as entireties by the decree of a court which has jurisdiction of the mortgagors? A vast number of railroads, partly in one state and partly in an adjoining state, forming continuous lines, have been constructed by consolidated companies, and mortgaged as entireties. It would be safe to say that more than $100,000 000 have been invested on the faith of such mortgages. In many cases these investments are sufficiently insecure at the best. But if the railroad, under legal process, can be sold only in fragments,—if, as in this case, where the mortgage is upon the whole line and includes the franchises of the corporation which made the mortgage, the decree of foreclosure and sale can reach only the part of the road which is within the state,—it is plain that the property must be comparatively worthless at the sale. A part of a railroad may be of little value when its ownership is severed from the ownership of another part. And the franchise of the company is not capable of division." The learned justice further says that it is "undoubtedly a recognized doctrine that a court of equity, sitting in a state and having jurisdiction of the person, may decree a conveyance by him of land in another state, and may enforce the decree by process against the defendant. True, it cannot send its process into that other state, nor can it deliver possession of land in another jurisdiction, but it can command and enforce a transfer of the title. And there seems to be no reason why it cannot, in a proper case, effect the transfer by the agency of the trustees when they are complainants. In McElrath v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. 55 Pa. 189,—a bill for foreclosure of a mortgage,—in which it appeared that a railroad company, whose road was partly in Pennsylvania and partly in West Virginia, had mortgaged all their rights in the whole road, the court decreed that the trustee who had brought the suit, being within its jurisdiction, should sell and convey all the mortgaged property, as well that in the state of West Virginia as that in Pennsylvania. This case is directly in point, and tends to justify the decree made in the present case. The mortgagors here were within the jurisdiction of the court. So were the trustees of the mortgage. It was at the instance of the latter the master was ordered to make the sale. The court might have ordered the trustees to make it. The mortgagors who were foreclosed were enjoined against claiming property after the master's sale, and directed to make a deed to the purchaser in further assurance. And the court can direct the trustees to make a deed to the purchaser in confirmation of the sale. We cannot, therefore, declare void the decree which was made."

The remaining question is, Can a state court, in a case of the kind now under consideration, with all the parties at interest before it, and having jurisdiction of the corporation, decree a foreclosure, and direct a sale of the entire railroad and the assets of the company in both states? We think that, taking the precautions and following the course indicated in the headnote, it can. The leading case in support of this proposition is that of McElrath v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co. supra, mentioned by Mr. Justice Strong. It is, for our purpose, squarely in point; and the fact that it was cited approvingly in a case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States makes it a very strong authority. It would therefore seem immaterial whether the jurisdiction in question is exercised by a state or a Federal court. We deem it unnecessary to say more on this subject, except to cite the following authorities, which to a greater or less extent, sustain the conclusion we have reached. Mead v. New York, H. & N. R. Co. 45 Conn. 199; Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. 12 S. C. 314; Wood v. Goodwin, 49 Me. 260, 77 Am. Dec. 259; 3 Wood, Railway Law, § 474; Jones, Railroads, §§ 413, 414.

If the foregoing views are sound, it follows, of course, that in admitting the evidence referred to in the headnote no error was committed by our gifted Brother Gamble, of the circuit bench, who handled with great skill these important and somewhat complicated cases.

Judgment affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Elizabeth PRICE et al., Appts.,
v.
PLANTERS' NATIONAL BANK et al.

(.....Va.....)

(January 16, 1896.)

1. The modes of alienation by the wife prescribed in an instrument creating a separate estate in her are not exclusive of other modes, unless such an intention can be clearly gathered from the face of the instrument.
2. A wife is conclusively presumed to have intended to make such separate estate as she owned, free from restraint, at the time of making a contract, liable therefor, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the contract.
3. The equitable separate estate of a wife may consist of any property and of any interest therein, and its nature and extent are to be determined according to the intention of the creator as ascertained from the construction of the instrument by which it is created; and it is not arbitrarily limited to such interest or property as would otherwise inure to the husband at common law.
4. The liability of the equitable separate estate of a wife for her debts contracted on faith thereof does not terminate upon discoverture by the death of the wife or husband, unless the estate is determined by the particular event that terminates the coverture.
5. A wife's equitable separate real property which is without restraint of alienation by her may be sold under decree after her death to discharge her general engagements contracted on faith of her separate estate, where her separate personal estate is insufficient for that purpose, and the rents and profits of the real estate will not within a reasonable time amount to enough to discharge them.

(Buchanan, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court of Richmond establishing plaintiffs' claim against certain separate property of Mary Triplett Haxall for debts which she had contracted. Affirmed.

A parcel of land on Franklin street in the city of Richmond was conveyed in trust for the sole, separate, and exclusive use and benefit of Mary Triplett Haxall free from the debts, contracts, control, management, and marital rights of her husband, present or future, with power in the trustee "to sell, exchange, or dispose of the property whenever directed so to do" by Mary Triplett Haxall by a writing under her hand attested by two witnesses, the proceeds to be given to her to be disposed of as she might wish or to be invested as she might direct. She was also given full power to dispose of the property by will. She died in 1892, leaving a will which devised the property to her husband for life with remainder to defendants in this action.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Pegram & Stringfellow, for appellants:

The terms of the deed import absolute dominion neither as to the corpus nor profits of her estate, and her estate and her power of alienating or charging the same are most essentially modified and restrained by the decisions of this court and by statute law.

See Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 572; Acts 1877–78, p. 248.

The separate estate was created only for the purpose of excluding the common-law marital right of the husband, and to secure to the wife an independent estate and income free from the control and influence of her husband.

Kelly, Contracts of Married Women, p. 232.

The mere creature of equity is allowed and maintained for the protection and maintenance of the wife against the improvidence and misfortune of the husband, and consequently it has its existence only during the period of coverture.

Cooney v. Woodburn, 33 Md. 326; 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. 209; Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 269, 72 Am. Dec. 503; Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 671; Howe v. Stortz, 27 W. Va. 555; Lechmere v. Brotheridge, 32 Beav. 363.

NOTE.—While modern statutes have made much change in the property rights of husband and wife in most states, the above decision respecting the equitable separate estate of a wife and its liability for her debts, especially after her death, will be valuable in several jurisdictions. As to the implied liability of a wife for family expenses, see note to Dodd v. St. John (Or.) 15 L. R. A. 717.

As to the liability of community property for debts, see note to Oregon Imp. Co. v. Sagmeister (Wash.) 19 L. R. A. 233.

As to rights in estates by the entirety, see note to Hiles v. Fisher (N. Y.) 30 L. R. A. 305.

So purely was the benefit to the wife alone contemplated that this separate estate was originally not liable for any of her contracts or engagements made during the coverture.

Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 405.

There is nowhere any hint that it was designed to extend her control over the corpus of her separate, any more than over that of her common law, real estate to the injury of the heir, ever the prime favorite of the law. The modern doctrine of courts of equity is founded on what appears to be a misconception of the leading principle of a settlement which obviously is to disable the husband and not to enable the wife,—at least further than is consistent with the security of her title, of which the grantor ought in the particular case to judge.

Thomas v. Folwell, 2 Whart. 11, 30 Am. Dec. 230.

This court should not assume legislative functions and extend it beyond the reason and necessity which gave rise to, and has been supposed to justify its creation.

Hutchings v. Commercial Bank, 91 Va. 68; West v. West, 3 Rand. (Va.) 385; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 574.

The corpus of the wife's separate real estate could in no case be held liable for her general engagements, except where specifically charged thereon by her own act, whether suit should be brought during her life or after her death.

Hulme v. Tenant, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th ed. pt. 2, p. 679; Allen v. Papworth, 1 Ves. Sr. 163; Heatley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. Jr. 596; Norton v. Turvill, 2 P. Wms. 144; Court v. Jeffery, 1 Sim. & Stu. 107.

Since Taylor v. Meads, 4 De G. J. & S. 597, a married woman, unless restricted, may in England charge, alien, encumber, convey, or devise the corpus of her separate real estate by her sole act, in all respects as a feme sole.

But Taylor v. Meads has not been followed in Virginia. The married woman here, "as to her separate real estate, has no power to dispose of the same unless the deed or instrument creating the same confers such power on her."

Dillard v. Dillard (Va.) 21 S. E. 670; Chapman v. Price, 83 Va. 394; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 571; Christian v. Keen, 80 Va. 374; Taylor v. Cussen, 90 Va. 42; Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 157; Harshberger v. Alger, 31 Gratt. 62; Filler v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458.

In Virginia the separate estate of a married woman is liable for her general engagements only to the extent of her personalty and the rents and profits of her realty, whether such liability is treated as an incident of the estate or is based on her presumed intention to bind it.

Frank v. Lilienfeld, 33 Gratt. 377; French v. Waterman, 79 Va. 623; Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 585; Kelly, Contracts of Married Women, 534; Taylor v. Cussen, supra.

This must be so on principle, for the possession of a separate estate does not enlarge the wife's capacity to contract so as to bind herself personally.

Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 270, 72 Am. Dec. 503.

Only the rents and profits accruing during the coverture can be subjected to the married woman's general engagements.

Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 674; Hogg v. Dower, 36 W. Va. 200; Hughes v. Hamilton, 19 W. Va. 371; Howe v. Stortz, 27 W. Va. 559; Macqueen, Husb. & W. 313; Nix v. Bradley, 6 Rich. Eq. 57; Bishop, Married Women, §§ 795, 796; Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 22.

If this court should hold, upon the principle of estoppel, substitution, or any other ground, that the rents and profits accruing during the lifetime of the wife are liable for her general engagements made during the coverture, it certainly does not follow that the rents and profits arising after her death are in like manner liable, and certainly not under the terms of the deed in question.

Waul v. Kirkman, 25 Miss. 619; 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. 207; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 4th ed. § 107; Cord, Rights of Married Women, 2d ed. § 256, note; Clancy, Husb. & W. p. 282; Allen v. Papworth, 1 Ves. Sr. 163; Grigby v. Cox, Id. 517; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 547.

The general engagement of the wife does not constitute any lien on the corpus of her separate estate.

Hughes v. Hamilton, 19 W. Va. 395; French v. Waterman, supra; Gore v. Knight, 2 Vern. 535.

That separate estate is in fact suspended during discoverture brought about by the death of the husband.

Nickell v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 346, and cases cited; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 2, 4th ed. 714, 769, and cases cited.

To hold that, while in Virginia a married woman cannot, unless expressly authorized so to do, convey the corpus of her separate realty by her sole deed, she can nevertheless, by the simple execution of her promissory notes, pledge the rents and profits thereof forever, would be to establish a principle somewhat more anomalous than any yet advanced in respect to property laws. "If a man seised of lands in fee by his deed granteth to another the profits of those lands to have and to hold to him and his heirs, and maketh livery secundum formam chartæ, the whole land itself doth passe; for what is the land but the profits thereof?"

Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 590, 39 L. ed. 822.

Mrs. Haxall gave no lien on the corpus of her land, and could not in law or in equity by notes alone give any perpetual lien on its rents and profits. Her separate estate in her land ceased at her death, and that alone she pledged to her creditors.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The liability of the equitable separate estate of a married woman after her death for her general engagements is the important question that confronts us in this case. Is it liable at all, and, if so, in what manner and to what extent? This precise question, so far as I am aware, has not heretofore been directly presented to this court for decision. The solution of this vexed question depends upon and must be governed by the nature of the separate estate, and the extent of the power of the married woman over it. Whatever may have been the adjudications and judicial expressions of the courts of England and of this state in the past, it is now settled, both there and here, that where property is settled to the separate use of a married woman, and the power is given to her, expressly or impliedly, to deal with it, she has the other power incident to property in general, namely, the power of creating debts to be paid out of it; and a court of equity will give effect to them, not as personal liabilities, but by laying hold of the separate property, and subjecting it to the payment of the debts contracted by her with reference to her separate property, and upon the faith and credit of it. Hulme v. Tenant, 1 Bro. Ch. 16, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. pt. 2, p. 679; Owens v. Dickenson, Craig & Ph. 48; Bank of Greensboro v. Chambers, 30 Gratt. 202, 32 Am. Rep. 661; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 565; Frank v. Lilienfeld, 33 Gratt. 377; Bain v. Buff, 76 Va. 374; Christian v Keen, 80 Va. 369.

Where the instrument creating the separate estate prescribes one mode of alienation by the wife, the prescribing of that mode is not to be construed as an intention to exclude alienation by her in any other manner, unless an intention to do so can be clearly gathered from the face of the instrument. Lee v

Bank of United States, 9 Leigh, 200; Woodson v. Perkins, 5 Gratt. 345; Frank v. Lilienfeld, and Christian v. Keen, supra. This is said by Mr. Burks, in his admirable treatise on Separate Estates (page 38), to be the decided weight of authority, both English and American. When the separate estate is created, it is nevertheless competent for the settlor to indicate what shall be the extent of her control over it. He may, contrary to the course of the common law, impose restraint, either absolute or qualified, on her power of alienation; and his intention to restrain may be either express or implied, but in either case it must be clear. When such intention appears, or can be gathered from the whole instrument, —the language used, the scheme of settlement, or the facts and circumstances of the particular case to be gathered from the instrument,—equity will respect it, and enforce the restraint that may be imposed. Bain v. Buff, supra; Burks, Separate Estates, 33; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 859. And in the enforcement of the general engagements of a married woman having an equitable separate estate, when it is once established that the contract which it is sought to enforce is hers, it is presumed, as a matter of law, that she intended to make liable for it such separate estate as she owned, free from restraint, at the time of entering into the engagement, unless the contrary intention is expressed in the contract; and a court of equity will so subject it, or so much of it as may then be owned by her. Va. Code, § 2295; Burks, Separate Estates, p. 86; Frank v. Lilienfeld, supra; Pike v. Fitzgibbon, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 454; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1123. So much for her power over her separate estate.

The next inquiry is: Of what may the separate estate consist? And according to what rule are its nature and extent to be determined and fixed? Are the nature of the estate and the degree of the interest of the married woman in it to be fixed by certain arbitrary rules, which may or may not, in the particular case, create in her a separate estate to the extent intended by the settlor, or are they to be arrived at by the natural and reasonable method of inspecting the instrument creating the estate, and discovering the intention of the settlor, and then construing the instrument and fixing the character of the estate and the quantity of the interest of the married woman in it according to such intention? When equity first created the separate estate, the main purpose was, no doubt, to intercept the marital rights of the husband; but, if it ever restricted the separate estate to such of the property of the married woman as her husband would have been entitled to by virtue of his marital rights at common law, such rule has long since been departed from. "Property of any kind, real or personal, and any interest therein," says Pomeroy in his Equity Jurisprudence (§ 1103), "may be conveyed, settled, or held to the wife's separate use. Her equitable separate estate may, therefore, include estates in fee in land, in possession, or reversion, life estates, estates for years, things in action, securities, specific chattels, or money." And not less comprehensive and emphatic is the language of Williams in his work on Real Property: "Not only the income, but the corpus, of any property, whether real or personal, may be limited to the separate use of a married woman." p. 225. See also Bright, Husb. & W. p. 204. "It was contended at the bar," said Lord Westbury in Taylor v. Meads, 4 DeG. J. & S. 597, "that the effect of this devise was to give the married woman an estate to her separate use only during the joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to herself in fee. But that is not the true construction of the will; the estate given to Elizabeth Meads [who was the married woman] is one and entire, being the equitable estate in fee, with a declaration, the effect of which is, that her husband shall have no interest in the estate so devised, nor shall the wife be under any disability with respect to such estate by reason of her existing coverture, but shall have the same rights of enjoyment and disposition as if she were a single, and not a married, woman." In Burging v. McDowell, 30 Gratt. 236, it was held that the married woman took a separate estate in fee in the land under the settlement made upon her, and that her sole deed vested in the purchaser, to whom she had sold and conveyed it, a perfect title. The equitable separate estate may therefore consist of any property and of any interest therein. It is what the settlor intended it to be, according as the intention may be ascertained by the true construction of the instrument by which the trust for the separate use is created, and is not arbitrarily limited to the interest or property covered by the marital rights of the husband at common law.

This brings us to the main question: To what extent and in what manner will a court of equity enforce the general engagements of a married woman against her equitable separate estate? It has been repeatedly held by this court that, unless the power of alienation by the married woman be restrained by the instrument creating the estate, all the personalty and the rents and profits of all the realty settled to her separate use may be subjected to their payment. As to this, there has never been any difficulty, but the controversy has been as to the right to subject the corpus of the real estate by a sale thereof. I can recall no case in which this court has gone so far, and none was cited by counsel in argument. In the case of Frank v. Lilienfeld, 33 Gratt. 399, Judge Burks, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said: "I think the English rule, as stated by Lord Thurlow, is substantially correct; and therefore, to satisfy a general engagement of the wife (and by general engagement I here mean an engagement made with reference to her separate estate, so as to make it liable in a general sense, but which does not amount to a specific lien of any sort upon such estate), the personal property, where the interest of the wife is absolute, and there is no restraint upon the alienation of such property imposed by the instrument creating the separate estate, may be sold by decree of the court, and, under like conditions, the rents and profits of the separate real property may be subjected; and to that end, following the analogy of the law so far, such real estate may be leased from time to time, by order of the court, until the debt out of the rents be discharged; but in no case, I think, should the real estate or any part thereof be sold by decree to satisfy the debt of the wife unless such debt be one secured by specific lien on such estate, created in a mode which conforms to the mode required for a valid disposition by her of that estate. If the creditor desires to bind the real estate in such a way as shall authorize the sale of it for the satisfaction of his debt, let him take the appropriate security within the power of the wife to give. If he fail to do this, equity cannot provide him a security which he has neglected to provide for himself." I have quoted thus fully from this opinion because it was concurred in by all the members of the court, and lays down with great accuracy and clearness the rule as to the liability of the equitable separate estate, according to the long course of decision in this state, except that, so far as I am aware, it is the only case in which it is stated that in no case should the real estate, or any part thereof, be sold to satisfy the debt of the wife, unless such debt be one secured by specific lien on such estate. Nevertheless, this court, in the enforcement of the general engagements of the wife, has never gone further than to subject to their payment the personalty and the rents and profits of the realty; and the doctrine that the corpus of the real estate—certainly as a general rule—will not be sold to satisfy the general engagements of a married woman is deeply imbedded in the law of this state. This is sustained by an unbroken line of decisions, many of which are collated in Burks on Separate Estates, p. 22, note. If we say now that these decisions are all wrong, and that the corpus of the real estate may be sold in all cases, will not our successors have more right to reverse our decision than we have to reverse those of our predecessors that may be said to be hoary with age? These decisions were made by this court when it was composed of judges of eminent ability and learning, and are entitled to the greatest weight and respect. As was said by Chief Justice Church in Yale v. Dederer, 68 N. Y. 335, in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of New York upon a similar question: "It is better to adhere to a rule of doubtful propriety, which has been deliberately settled for a long series of years, and repeatedly reiterated by all the courts of the state, than, by overturning it, to weaken the authority of judicial decisions, and render the law fluctuating and uncertain." I am aware that there exists a decided difference of opinion among judges and lawyers upon the particular question in controversy here, which makes it all the more proper, if the general rule, so long and so uniformly adhered to by this court, is to be abrogated, that it should be done by legislative power. But, while this court has never gone further than to subject the personalty and the rents and profits of the realty to the payment of the general engagements of the married woman, yet the right to subject them is not confined to the period of the coverture. If these are liable for her debts during the coverture, and may be subjected to that end during that period, no good ground is perceived, nor can any valid reason be assigned, why they should not continue to be liable after the termination of the coverture, whether by her own death or that of her husband or otherwise, unless the estate is determined by the particular event that terminates the coverture. Once liable, the right to subject it to the extent of the separate estate should continue until the debts are discharged.

In Ropp v. Minor, 33 Gratt. 97, 116, Judge Burks said: "The subsequent discoverture . . . cannot per se give any other or greater force and effect to her prior engagements than they had during the coverture. Such engagements did not bind her personally either at law or in equity, so as to warrant a personal judgment or decree against her. They affected her separate estate to the extent, and only to the extent, of her then existing powers over it. They had no other operation. Her subsequent discoverture could not, upon any principle known to us, operate, by estoppel or otherwise, to enlarge the liabilities of that estate imposed by the engagements when entered into." If, in the creation of the particular separate estate, it was so created that it might extend beyond the period of coverture, the continuance thereafter of its liability for her debts until discharged is not in conflict with what was said in Ropp v. Minor, supra. Such continuance of liability does not enlarge the estate or its liability for the debts of the feme covert or her powers over it. These are not enlarged by the discoverture; neither should they be thereby lessened or restrained, but should remain the same. The married woman having the right during the coverture, in the absence of any restraint on her power of alienation, to make her separate estate liable for her general engagements, and having contracted debts on the faith and credit of the estate, and thereby created the right to subject it to their payment, it is equitable and just that such separate estate should continue liable as well after the termination of the coverture as during its existence; and equity, because it is just, will, after the termination of the coverture, as well as during its existence, enforce the right against the estate, or so much of it as may then remain in her ownership. 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 692; Norton v. Turvill, 2 P. Wms. 144; Gregory v. Lockyer, 6 Madd. 90; Heatley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. Jr. 596; Anonymous, 18 Ves. Jr. 258; 2 Roper, Husb. & W. 245. In Burnett v. Hawpe, 25 Gratt. 481, the suit was brought, after the termination of the coverture by the death of the husband, against his widow, who had married again, to subject her separate estate to the payment of a debt she had contracted during the coverture with her first husband. Having sold, after his death, a part of the land settled to her separate use, the purchaser was decreed to pay to the plaintiff the balance he owed her on the land, it being considered a just compensation for the rents and profits that might have accrued from the land if she had not sold it, in satisfaction pro tanto of his claim; and an account was ordered to be taken of her separate personal estate, and the rents and profits of the residue of the lands settled to her separate use, for the purpose of applying the same to the debt of the plaintiff. On appeal to this court, the decree of the lower court was affirmed. And so, in Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 153, the rents and profits of land which had been purchased with the proceeds of the sale of the land in which the feme covert had an equitable separate estate for her life were subjected to the payment of debts contracted by her after the termination of the coverture by the death of her husband, and also for debts contracted by her during the coverture as surety for him. These two cases clearly decide, in the result, that the rents and profits of real estate settled to the separate use, which accrued after the termination of the coverture, were liable to the payment of the general engagements of the married woman entered into by her during the coverture, and refute the contention that the right exists to subject only such as accrue during the coverture, and that the liability of her separate estate for the payment of her debts ceases with the termination of the coverture. It may be said that this question was not raised in those cases, and was not therefore considered by the court. It is true that the precise question does not appear to have been discussed by Judge Staples, who delivered the opinion in each case, but it is not to be presumed that it escaped the attention and consideration of himself and the other able and vigilant judges who then administered justice from this bench.

The settlement in this case was made upon Mrs. Haxall by her mother during the coverture. An examination of the deed of settlement shows that it vested in Mrs. Haxall an equitable separate estate in fee in the real estate. While the deed enumerates certain specific powers (and they are very broad), which may be exercised by her, it nevertheless contains no negative words restraining her from exercising any other power, nor anything from which restraint on her power of alienation may be properly inferred. She had therefore an absolute power of alienation over the estate, and the consequential right to make it liable for her contracts. The debts which are sought to be enforced were all contracted since May 1, 1888, when the present Code went into effect, and she is therefore presumed to have made them with reference to her said separate estate as a source of credit. Besides such presumption, the evidence is express and positive, leaving no room for doubt or question, that she contracted the debts on the faith and credit of her said estate, and intended to bind it for their payment. In accordance with the principles applicable to equitable separate estates, as hereinbefore set forth, her creditors had the right to ask that the rents and profits of the real estate be applied to their payment. But, when we seek to apply the general rule, we are confronted with this difficulty: that the annual rents and profits are insufficient to discharge the interest actually accruing on the debts, from which it follows that the debts will go on increasing, and the creditors be entitled to receive the rents and profits of the land forever. Such a result would be unjust both to the creditors and also to the devisees of Mrs. Haxall. The former would never be able to obtain satisfaction of their debts, and the latter could never have any enjoyment of the property. The subjection of the rents and profits of the realty merely in such case would be a wholly ineffectual remedy, while a sale would be beneficial to all the parties. It is characteristic of equity that it will mould its remedies, as far as consistent with the rights of the parties, to meet the exigency of the case. Where such a state of facts exists as here, a court of equity will, upon the principle of accelerating the remedy, decree a sale of the land, the rents and profits whereof would otherwise, under the general rule, be subjected to the payment of the debts. Indeed, we are not without a precedent in this respect. At common law, lands of the debtor could not be taken to satisfy his debts, except judgments due to the King, and judgments did not therefore operate as liens on land; but, by the statute (Stat. Westm. 2, 13 Edw. I. chap. 18), a new execution was provided,—the writ of elegit,—which enabled the creditor to extend a moiety of the lands of the debtor, either in his own hands or in the hands of a purchaser, or of the heir, to satisfy the judgment, which, by the judicial construction given to the writ, was said to be a lien on the land. Borst v. Nalle, 28 Gratt. 428; Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 608, 1 Ambl. 13. But, while the writ gave the creditor the right to take the rents and profits of a moiety of the land at an estimated annual value until his debt was satisfied, yet it was held (Lord Hardwicke leading the way, in Stileman v. Ashdown, supra, and Lord Redesdale following, in O'Gorman v. Comyn, 2 Sch. & Lef. 138) that a court of equity, where the rents and profits would not pay the judgment within a reasonable time, would sell a moiety of the land, and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of the debt, and that, while equity could not change the rights of the parties, yet it would accelerate the payment of the judgment by directing a sale of a moiety of the land to the rents and profits of which the creditor was only entitled under his writ of elegit, and not compel him to await the tedious operation of its discharge out of the annual rents and profits. See also 2 Rob. Pr. (Old) 46; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1216, a, c; Curtis v. Curtis, 2 Bro. Ch. 634; Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh, 31; Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh, 196; Burton v. Smith, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 464, 10 L. ed. 248. The only difference between that class of cases and the one before us is that in that case equity was asked to enforce a judgment that was a legal lien, and that in this case its jurisdiction is invoked to enforce an equitable liability; both being confined to the rents and profits of the real estate, but it being peculiarly the province of equity to enforce the latter against the separate estate, which is the work of its own creation. The principle which justified a sale of a moiety of the land in the cases decided by Lords Hardwicke and Redesdale applies with all its force to the case before the court. I am of opinion, therefore, that where there is no equitable separate personal estate applicable to the discharge of her general engagements, or, if so, that it is insufficient for that purpose, and the rents and profits of the real estate constituting her equitable separate estate will never discharge the debts, or not do so within a reasonable time, it is proper to decree a sale of the land for that purpose, and that, to this extent, the general rule laid down in the case of Frank v. Lilienfeld, 33 Gratt. 377, should be qualified. What is reasonable time is a matter of discretion of every day's occurrence in courts of equity. In respect to this matter, they might well adopt, as a general rule, by way of analogy to the law, the period which the legislature, in the statute regulating the enforcement of judgment liens in equity, has, in its wisdom, fixed as a reasonable time within which, if the rents and profits will discharge the judgment, the land should not be sold. Va. Code, § 3571; Rep. Rev. Code 1849, p. 918.

For the foregoing reasons, I am of opinion that there is no error in the decree of the chancery court in directing, under the particular circumstances of this case, a sale, instead of the renting of the real estate, and am therefore for affirming the same.

Buchanan, J., dissenting:

I regret that I am unable to concur in the opinion of the court.

The principles which ought to control in the decision of this case, in my judgment, have been recognized and acted upon for nearly three quarters of a century in a long line of decisions. Beginning with West v. West, reported in 3 Rand. (Va.) 373, and coming down to Taylor v. Cussen, 90 Va. 40, this court has never recognized the right of the creditor of a married woman to subject the corpus of her equitable separate real estate to the payment of her general engagements during coverture, but such right, whenever asserted, has always been denied.

How the death of the wife can, upon any principle of law, enlarge such a creditor's rights, and enable him to subject, after her death, property which he had no right to subject during her coverture, I am utterly unable to understand. No reason has been, or, in my judgment, can be, given, for the exercise of such a right after her death, which does not apply with equal force during coverture.

The principle involved in both cases is the same.

The necessary effect of this decision is therefore to overturn a rule of law imbedded in our decisions, and which has become a rule of property, and thus disturb vested rights.

If the rule of law governing this court in its former decisions is founded upon incorrect principles, and fails to accomplish fully the ends of justice, the remedy is with the legislature. Laws by that body operate prospectively only, while laws made by the court operate retrospectively as well as prospectively, and are subject to the double objection that they are made without authority, and disturb vested rights.

W. T. GARTHRIGHT.

(..... Va. .....)

1. An erroneous instruction will not require a reversal if the verdict was correct and should have been rendered if the instruction had been correct.
2. The unreasonable overloading of a street car, and its unlawful speed, which make it impossible to stop the car as soon as may be necessary to avert a collision, are gross negligence which renders the street-railway company liable for a resulting accident.
3. A verdict for $1,000 damages cannot be held excessive in a case of personal injury by which a person's teeth were broken and his knee injured so that he was lame for a long time and unable to work efficiently at his trade for six or eight months.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the City of Richmond to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wyndham R. Meredith, for plaintiff in error:

At the time of the accident the truck company was not going to a fire though one was in progress, but was going to what they call a relief,—that is, they were going from their engine house in the extreme western part of the city to another engine house more centrally located. The orders were not to go as fast to a relief as to a fire.

It was disobedience of the orders that produced the accident, and this plaintiff was clearly the author of his own wrong.

The driver declares that he paid no attention to the car, and made no effort to stop or slacken his speed.

No driver should go on when it is obvious that the collision will be inevitable, or where there is a probability that his attempt to pass will result in a collision he is not entitled to make the experiment.

Before the question can be submitted to the jury there must be evidence (1) by experts having competent knowledge of the subject, showing that (2) the particular appliance or machine has been tested; (3) that it materially contributed to the safety of the railway's operations; (4) that it is in practical use; (5) that it could have been adopted by the railway, and (6) that, if adopted, it would have prevented the injury to the plaintiff.

Roanoke Nat. Bank v. Hambrick, 82 Va. 135; Southwest Imp. Co. v. Andrew, 86 Va. 275.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment to which the writ of error was awarded in this case was recovered for injuries received in a collision between a car of the Richmond Railway & Electric Company and a hook and ladder truck of the fire department of the city of Richmond. Three grounds are assigned for the reversal of the judgment.

The first is that the plaintiff in the suit was barred of the right to recover because of his own contributory negligence. The case comes before us upon a certificate of the evidence, and in considering it we must apply the familiar rules applicable to a demurrer to evidence. These rules require us to accept as true all of the plaintiff's evidence, and all just inferences which could be properly drawn from it by a jury, and to reject all of the evidence of the defendant which conflicts with that of the plaintiff, and all inferences which do not necessarily result from it. Many witnesses were examined on both sides, and there was considerable conflict in much of the testimony. It is unnecessary to rehearse it, but sufficient to say that, testing it by the above rules, the evidence clearly establishes the negligence of the defendant company, and does not justify the claim that the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence that, but for the same, the accident would not have happened.

The second assignment of error relates to the instruction given by the court, numbered 2, which is as follows: "The jury are further instructed that if they believe from the evidence that when the horses of the truck came in sight of persons on the defendant's car the said car was at such a distance from the point of collision that the accident might have been averted but for the want of a Sprague motor on the car, or the crowding on the platform of passengers preventing the motorman's use of his machinery, then the defendant company was guilty of negligence, and the jury must find for the plaintiff, even though they believe that the motorman on the car did all in his power to stop his car, unless they believe that the negligence of plaintiff or tillerman contributed to the accident." The objection made to this instruction is that it pronounces the failure of the company to equip its car with a Sprague motor to be negligence, when there was no evidence before the jury tending to show that such motor was a necessary equipment of its car, or that the want of it caused the accident in which the plaintiff was injured. The evidence upon this point was very meager. Only three witnesses, all of whom were called by the defendant, testified in regard to the matter. One of them, Mr. Hill, who had worked in the shops of the company, and was a conductor on one of its cars at the time he testified, but had never been a motorman, stated that this particular car was the only one that was provided at the time of the accident with a Westinghouse motor, and that the others were equipped with Sprague motors. When questioned as to which was the best machine for stopping a car suddenly, he answered that the Westinghouse "reverses slower," and that the Sprague "takes quicker than the other," whatever that may mean. Mr. Jackson, who was the conductor on the car, was asked by which motor could a car be stopped in the shortest distance, and replied that it was as easy to stop the car with the one as the other. Maj. Selden, the superintendent of the company, was the only other witness as to this matter. He stated that the company, at the time he testified, was using the Westinghouse motor almost entirely on its Main street line and the Sprague motor on its Clay street line. When asked which was the best motor, he stated, "I think the Westinghouse a little better;" and, when asked further, if a car could be stopped quicker with the Westinghouse motor than with the Sprague, he replied: "The difference is so slight, it is hardly appreciable." The foregoing is substantially all the evidence upon which the instruction complained of was based. It thus appears that it was not testified to that the Sprague motor was a better appliance than the Westinghouse, or that at the time of the accident it had been tested and was in practical use by electric street railways, or had been adopted by them as a safer machine, or that the accident could have been averted if the car had been equipped with a Sprague motor. It was the legal duty of the defendant company to provide its cars with suitable and safe machinery. It is incumbent upon a railway company, propelled by the powerful and dangerous agencies of steam or electricity, especially in a large and populous city, to use ordinary and reasonable care to avail itself of all new inventions and improvements known to it which will contribute to the safety of its passengers, and prevent accidents to others, whenever the utility of such improvement has been tested and demonstrated; but it is not required to have in use the latest improvements which human skill and ingenuity have devised to prevent accidents. Patterson, Railway Accident Law, §§ 245-247, and Elliott, Roads & Streets, 610. The instruction was erroneous in singling out the Sprague motor, and making the liability of the railway company depend upon its failure to equip its car with such motor, if the jury believed that by its use the accident could have been averted, when it had not been shown in evidence that the Sprague motor was a better and a safer appliance, or that it had been tested, and its superiority over the Westinghouse demonstrated. It does not follow, however, that the judgment for that reason must be reversed. It is the settled rule of this court, recognized and acted upon in numerous cases, that if the court can see from the whole record that, even under correct instructions, a different verdict could not have been rightly found, or that the exceptant could not have been prejudiced by the erroneous instruction, it will not for such error, reverse it. Preston v. Harrey, 2 Hen. & M. 55; Colvin v. Menefee, 11 Gratt 87; Kincheloe v. Tracewells, Id. 587; Danvil'e Bank v Waddill, 27 Gratt. 448; Brighthope R. Co. 85 Va. 792; and Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey (decided at the present term) 24 S. E. 232. See also Sackett, Instructions to Juries, 2d ed.

The collision between the car and the truck took place at the intersection of Main and Third streets. The car was passing down Main street and the truck was proceeding along Third street. It appears from the evidence that the company had the right, under the law, to run its cars at as great a rate of speed as 6 miles an hour; that this car was capable of seating twenty-two persons, and could comfortably transport as many as fifty persons; that the cars could be stopped within a distance equal to their length, or at most within a distance equal to a length and a half of a car, which was generally understood by the public; and that this particular car was about 22 feet long, including its front and rear platforms. It also appears from the evidence that the car at the time of the collision was crowded with passengers to its utmost capacity, and that both platforms, and even the steps were thronged; it being variously estimated that there were not less than from sixty to eighty people on the car. So crowded and jammed together were they that the conductor was unable to collect the fare from half of them, and the motorman unable, as testified to by some of the witnesses, to have free command of his brake. As to the foregoing facts there was no material, if any, conflict between the evidence of the plaintiff and that of the defendant. There was very much conflict, however, in the evidence in other material respects. If we look to that of the plaintiff alone, it appears that the car was somewhere between 50 and 90 feet—these being the two extremes of the estimates of the witnesses—above Third street when the truck reached Main street, and started to go across the car track; and that it could have been easily stopped, and the collision prevented, if the car had not been overloaded with passengers, and running at the rate of 8 to 12 miles an hour,—much in excess of the speed allowed by law. Upon this evidence, it could but be held that the company was guilty of gross negligence irrespective of the kind of motor with which it was equipped. If we turn now to the evidence of the defendant, it appears that the witnesses estimated that the car was going slower than usual,—at a speed of only 3 to 4½ miles an hour,—and that it was from 40 to 50 feet from Third street when the truck was first seen by persons on the car, passing rapidly from Third street across the track of the railway. There was then ample distance within which the car could ordinarily have been brought to a stop with either the Westinghouse or Sprague motor, and the collision been averted. After the truck, which, together with the horses, measured 50 feet, was seen by the passengers, and was, or should have been, seen by the motorman, it had nearly time enough to clear the track of the railway before the car struck it, the car having struck the truck immediately in front of its hind wheels, about 42 feet back from the heads of the horses drawing it. If the car, with a full complement of passengers, but not loaded beyond its proper capacity, was capable of being stopped within a distance equal to its own length, which was 22 feet, or at most within a space less than twice its length, when running at its maximum speed of 6 miles an hour, as the evidence shows it follows that it could have been brought to a stop in a still shorter distance, if going at a rate not exceeding 4 or 4½ miles an hour. The car had not less than 50 feet, and probably considerably more, within which to be stopped after the truck was seen about to cross the railway track, when ordinarily half of this distance would have sufficed. It is self-evident that the heavier the load, the more unmanageable the car, and the greater the distance required within which to stop it. And this is fully confirmed by the testimony of Maj. Selden, an expert electrician, and the superintendent of the company, than whom no witness was more competent to speak. In answer to the question, What would be a reasonable distance within which to stop the car? he replied: "From all accounts, they had a very heavy load; probably seventy or eighty passengers." I would estimate that that car weighed at least 15,000 pounds, if it had eighty passengers, knowing the weight of the car and motor. . . . I don't think a car with the weight that that car had on could be stopped in less than 50 or 60 feet, going at any speed." This being so, it is manifest that the collision between the car and the truck was caused by the crowded and overloaded condition of the car, and not all due to the particular motor with which the car was equipped. Upon the whole evidence, therefore, the verdict was right, and the railway company could not have been prejudiced by the error contained in the instruction complained of. The people of a city and vehicles have the same right to pass along an intersecting street as the car has to go across it. "The car has the right to cross and must cross the street, and the vehicle has the right to cross and must cross the railroad track. Neither has a superior right to the other." O'Neil v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 125; Buhrens v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 53 Hun, 571, Affirmed 125 N. Y. 702; Chicago City R. Co. v. Young, 62 Ill. 238, and Booth, Street Railway Law, § 304, and cases there cited. And it is gross negligence in a street-railway company to overcrowd and load down its cars with passengers beyond any reasonable and proper limit, and, consequently, not to be able to control and stop them readily as they approach an intersecting street, in case it may be necessary to do so to avert a collision or prevent an accident.

The third assignment of error is that the damages are excessive. It was proved by Dr. Ross, the surgeon who was summoned to attend the plaintiff at the time of the accident, that the plaintiff had a wound on the side of his face and through his brow, which he had to close with stitches; that he was suffering from concussion, and insensible when he dressed his wounds, and that he remained insensible until the next morning. He also stated that the plaintiff was much bruised about his body, and that he attended him professionally for ten days or two weeks. The plaintiff himself testified that, besides the injuries mentioned by Dr. Ross, his teeth were broken, that his knee was so injured that he was lame for a long time, and that he was rendered unable to work efficiently at his trade for six or eight months. No method has yet been devised, nor scales adjusted, by which to measure or weigh and value in money the degrees of pain and anguish of a suffering human being, nor ever likely to be; and we cannot say, upon the evidence in this case, that $1,000 was excessive damages. It was not so great, considering the injuries proved to have been sustained by the plaintiff, as to furnish ground for believing that the jury were actuated by partiality or prejudice; and, unless such is the case, under the well-settled rule in this state the court should not disturb the verdict. Farish v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, and Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34.

There is no error in the judgment complained of for which it should be reversed, and the same is affirmed.

JOHNSON COUNTY.

(.....Neb.....)

1. An outgoing county treasurer turned over to his successor a certificate evidencing the deposit of county funds in a bank for safe-keeping, and the same was received by the incoming treasurer as a payment to him, to its amount, of such funds. The certificate of deposit was, by the new treasurer, delivered to the bank which had issued it, and was canceled, and the treasurer received in lieu thereof a certificate of deposit for a like sum, payable to him as county treasurer. Held, that the incoming treasurer and his bondsmen were chargeable on his bond for the amount of such payment, and a subsequent failure of the bank during the time the bank was continued, and his consequent inability to realize the money, did not relieve them of the liability.

2. The duty imposed on a county treasurer by law, and assumed by him, of safely keeping and accounting for and turning over the public funds which come into his hands by virtue of his office, is an absolute one. And where his bond is conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the office by him, the sureties on the bond are bound and liable in like manner and their responsibility is the same as that of their principal; and it will be no defense for either of the parties, in an action on the bond to recover public funds, predicated on an alleged failure of the treasurer to account for or pay them over, that the funds have been lost or stolen without the fault or negligence of the treasurer.

3. It is the duty of the bondsmen of a county treasurer to see that the duties of that officer are properly discharged; and if the county board shall be negligent or careless in the examination of the accounts or report of the treasurer, such examination and settlement will not be available as a defense to the sureties on his bond in an action for funds which the treasurer has failed to turn over.

by our statutes to be made between the county board and the treasurer of the county do not have in them the elements of a judicial determination of the subjects involved.

5. The case of Ragoss v. Cuming County, 36 Neb. 375, examined and distinguished.

6. A county treasurer, during his first term, had on deposit in a bank $6,000 of the public funds, such deposit being evidenced by a certificate of deposit. At the close of this term of office and the beginning of the second term, in his report to and settlement with the county board, he included and stated the amount of the certificate of deposit as so much cash; the board possessing no knowledge of the existence of the certificate, or of the deposit of the money. Before the close of the treasurer's first term, the bank failed. Held, that such settlement did not bind the county, as an acceptance or approval of the certificate of deposit as so much cash accounted for; nor did its retention by the treasurer, or turning it over to himself as his own successor, constitute a paying over of the public funds, but was a failure to do so, which rendered him and the obligors on his bond for his first term liable.

(April 10, 1890.)

ERROR to the District Court for Johnson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce the liability of the parties on the official bond of a former county treasurer for his failure to turn over moneys which had been delivered to him as such treasurer. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. P. Davidson, T. Appelget, and I. Reavis, for plaintiffs in error:

The payment of money in the hands of a county treasurer at the termination of his office to his successor can be effectuated only by the delivery of that which by the law of the land is recognized as money.

The mere delivery of certificates of deposit of a banker,—no money having been realized from them,—even if assented to by the successor, is not a payment, nor will it relieve the outgoing treasurer and his sureties from liability on his official bond, for failing to pay over money found to be due from him to the county on final settlement.

Cedar County Comrs. v. Jenal, 14 Neb. 254.

The bondsmen of Bush are liable only for money received by him as county treasurer, and not for checks, certificates of deposit, or open bank accounts, upon which the money was not realized.

The sureties on the bond of defendant are released because the evidence fails to bring their liability within the conditions of the bond, and as a surety is entitled to stand upon the strict terms of his contract, if it is not so brought he is released.

It is made the duty of county treasurers, under and by the laws of this state, to make settlement of the affairs of their offices with the boards transacting business for their counties and at stated periods. In this case Bush performed that duty, and it is abundantly proved by the testimony that the county board approved all his accounts and made such approval a matter of record.

Messrs. J. Hall Hitchcock and E. W. Thomas, for defendant in error:

If a taxpayer were to give the treasurer his check for money he had in a bank near by in payment of his taxes, and the treasurer carelessly carried it for months, and then the bank should fail and thereafter be unable to pay the same, could it be contended that the man's taxes were not paid or that the treasurer could not be compelled to account for the amount of taxes so paid? We think not.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

David R. Bush was elected treasurer of Johnson county at the election which was held during the fall of 1889, and took possession of and commenced the performance of the duties of the office in January, 1890; was re-elected in the fall of 1891; and in January, 1892, closed his first, and began his second, term as treasurer. The other plaintiffs in error were his bondsmen for the first term. Bush's immediate predecessor in the office of county treasurer, when he turned over the office and funds, in January, 1891, delivered to Bush some $40 or $50 in actual cash or money, in its strict meaning, and gave him certificates evidencing deposits which the retiring treasurer had in banks, and also some checks. These were accepted by the incoming treasurer, and received as between him and the outgoing one, as payment of the amounts stated in them. One of these certificates or checks was for the sum of $6,000, payable by the Bank of Russell & Holmes, at Tecumseh. Bush presented this at the banking office of Russell & Holmes, and, in lieu of it, received a certificate of deposit for the sum named. This he retained through and beyond the entire time and close of his first term as treasurer. In his report to the county board at or near the close of his first term, a certain balance was shown to be on hand. A portion of this balance was this sum evidenced by the certificate mentioned. The bank in which this money was deposited continued business in the regular manner until October, 1891, at which time it closed, a month or two before the expiration of Bush's first term. When the facts were discovered in regard to this and some other certificates of deposit (we have here particularly to deal with this one), action was instituted on the bond against plaintiffs in error to recover the amount as an alleged shortage.

There were two principal questions raised by the pleadings: First, that Bush, the county treasurer, never received the money, the $6,000, to recover which was the object of this suit; second, that, at the expiration of his term of office, he made a settlement of his doings and accounts as county treasurer with the county commissioners, whereby the county became bound, and it cannot or should not be heard to assert any claim as against the treasurer or his bondsmen A jury was waived and a trial had. Judgment was rendered against the treasurer and bondsmen for the $6,000 and interest thereon. The case has been brought to this court by proceedings in error.

In regard to what transpired in January, 1889, between the outgoing treasurer and Mr. Bush, the incoming officer, in regard to the funds of the county and their transfer from one to the other of the officers, Mr. Zutavern, the retiring treasurer, testified as follows:

Q. Mr. Zutavern, what official position did you hold in this county in the years '88 and '89?

A. County treasurer.

Q. Who was your successor?

A. D. R. Bush.

Q. Do you know how much money you turned over to Mr. Bush at the time you went out of the office?

A. I do not know now.

Q. You may state to the court how you delivered the things in the treasurer's office to Mr. Bush, at the time your term of office expired, with reference to the money on hand.

A. I turned over all the money that belonged to the county to Mr. Bush

Q. How did you turn it over?

A. Why, by checks, most of it. I guess I had a little cash on hand, maybe $40 or $50, in the drawer; and I turned that over. I turned him over a few certificates.

Q. State how it was you did not give him the money.

A. I had the certificates, and asked Bush if he could use them,—whether they would answer as well as money; and he said they would. There was nothing said about me getting the cash, I do not think.

Q. State the facts as to whether they were equivalent to cash at that time, and for how long.

A. They were.

Q. Did Mr. Bush ever give you any information, in any form or manner, after this, that he could not use these certificates, or ask you to take them up, or any of the things you turned over as the amount of money on hand?

A. No, sir.

Q. Why didn't you turn the money over in cash at the expiration of your term of office to Mr. Bush?

A. I had these certificates and showed them to Bush, and asked him if he could use them; and he said that he could. That was my reason. He said they would do him as well as money.

Q. You were acquainted with the financial condition of the different banks upon which you had the bank certificates?

A. I think I was.

Q. You were acquainted with their condition, with reference to paying of their papers presented to them for a year after that? From that time on for another year?

A. I think I was.

Q. Well, what was it?

A. They were good.

Q. They paid all of the demands made on them?

A. Yes, sir.

A portion of the testimony of Mr. Bush is as follows:

Q. Mr. Bush, you are the defendant, one of the defendants, in this case?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are the principal defendant, are you not, in this case?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. (Handing witness plaintiff's Exhibit E.) What is that paper you now have?

A. It is a certificate of deposit on the Bank of Russell & Holmes.

Q. You are the person who is named in that certificate as payee, are you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were county treasurer at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was paid to you as county treasurer?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The consideration of that check was county money?

A. It was a check given me for county money.

Q. And you took the check to the bank and got that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At your own request?

A. At the request of Mr. Charles Holmes.

Q. Did you ask him for the cash?

A. No, sir.

Q. You did not want it?

A. No, sir.

Q. You could have got it?

A. I do not know whether I could or not.

Q. You have every reason to believe it? You had not known them to refuse any certificates, had you?

A. No, sir.

Q. You have got money out of there, as county treasurer, since that was deposited there, haven't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That was a part of the funds you received from Zutavern, your predecessor?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At the end of your first term, you did not turn that over except in the form of a certificate, as it appears there, to yourself?

A. There was no change.

Q. Just that certificate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you settled with the county board at the end of your first term, January, 1892, you turned over that certificate in your report to the county commissioners, as part of the funds on hand?

A. Why, I suppose you would call it that, simply in my own hands.

Q. You turned it over to yourself as successor?

A. I believe that is what it would be.

Q. You never turned any cash over to represent that?

A. No, sir.

In this connection it may be further said that all of the testimony introduced which had a bearing upon the question of whether the Bank of Russell & Holmes was, at the time of the transaction between Zutavern and Bush, of date January, 1890, solvent, and meeting all demands for payments of money made upon it, tended to establish that it was so, and so doing and continued in such condition for more than a year subsequent thereto.

It is clear from the evidence that Mr. Bush, on assuming the duties of the office of county treasurer, received from the retiring officer a check or certificate of deposit, entitling him to demand from the Bank of Russell & Holmes the sum of $6,000, and that it was so accepted by him in such form, in lieu of the cash, either coin or legal-tender currency; that he did not demand any other or different payment, but waived it, and the check or certificate of deposit was by him delivered to the bank, and canceled; and, at the request of the banker, he received a new certificate of deposit for the sum named, payable to himself, as county treasurer. The title or right to the sum of money involved was, by the methods stated, transferred from Mr. Zutavern to Mr. Bush, the latter being the recipient of it, by reason of his occupancy of the office of county treasurer. The reception of this money from his predecessor was one of the duties which devolved upon the incoming treasurer, his due and proper performance of which, together with all others pertaining to the office, his sureties, by signing the bond, had guaranteed. Giving the bond was one of the essential prerequisites of his assuming the office, and without which he could not legally do so; and the sureties, by their signatures, enabled him to meet this requirement, and to acquire title or right to this money; and, having acquired it, he and the bondsmen became liable to the county for it. The fact that he elected to take a certificate of deposit evidencing the indebtedness of a bank to his predecessor in office for the amount, instead of coin or currency, and to have the certificate canceled, and a new one issued, payable to himself as county treasurer, and to let the money remain in the bank, and to carry the sum thus treated in his accounts as such treasurer, as moneys or funds on hand could in no manner or degree affect his liability, or that of his bondsmen. He became possessed of the right to $6,000 of the funds of the county, and liable for its safekeeping, and to account for it, and, at the request of the banker, left it in the bank. This was a sufficient reception by him of the money of the county to render him and his sureties liable for it under the conditions of this bond, within the rule announced in State v. Hill, 47 Neb. ——.

What effect the transactions we have outlined between the two treasurers would have upon the rights of the county, if any, existing or arising therefrom, against Zutavern, the outgoing treasurer, and his bondsmen, is not involved in this case, and will not be discussed or decided. It is evident that Bush, the incoming treasurer, acquired the right to act in relation to the $6 000 of the county funds, and by his action it was left in the bank. This was such an act of right of control and disposition of the money as rendered him liable to account for it.

It is argued that the treasurer is only bound to use due and ordinary care for the safe-keeping and preservation of the money of the county, and if he deposited it in the bank after using reasonable and ordinary care and caution in ascertaining the standing and solvent condition of the bank, and was watchful in this particular so long as it remained there, if the bank failed, and the money was thereby lost to the county, in whole or in part, without any fault or negligence attributable to the treasurer, he was not liable for such loss, nor were his sureties so liable. There exists an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions of the courts in regard to the liability of public officers and their bondsmen for funds lost without fault or negligence on the part of the officers; but the weight of authority in this country is to the effect that a public officer and his sureties are to be held responsible for public funds lost, regardless of the question of fault or negligence on the part of the officer, where the law, in positive terms or from its general tenor, and without any limitation upon the obligation, requires that the officer pay over public funds which have been received by him and held as such.

Where the statutes impose the duty of payment, it is sufficient if the bond is conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of the officer, to render the sureties liable to the same extent as their principal. Our statutes on the subject, by their general tenor, if not in direct terms, require the retiring treasurer to account for or pay over the public moneys. The bond in this case was conditioned for the faithful discharge by the treasurer of the duties of the office, and for the faithful accounting for and paying over of all the moneys of the county which he received; and both he and his sureties became liable for any failure on his part to pay over any of the public money, notwithstanding it may have been lost without his fault or negligence. Pine Island Bd. of Edu. v. Jewell, 44 Minn. 427, and cases cited as follows: United States v. Prescott, 44 U S. 3 How. 578, 11 L. ed. 734; United States v. Dasheill, 71 U. The case of Ward v. School Dist. No. 15, 10 Neb. 293, 35 Am. Rep. 477, cited in the opinion of the Minnesota court just alluded to, in support of the doctrine of strict accountability of treasurers and their bondsmen, for public money intrusted to the care of the treasurers by virtue of their being such officers; may be said to be not strictly in point, for the reason that the money lost by failure of the bank, and sought in the action to be recovered of the treasurer and his bondsmen, had been deposited by the treasurer in the bank to his own individual credit. This court held: "The defendant, while treasurer of the plaintiff district, deposited the money in question with his banker to his own individual credit. The money was intended to meet certain bonds of the district, then about to fall due, and which were payable at that bank, and the defendant so informed the banker, and directed him verbally to so apply it when the bonds were presented. While in this condition the bank failed, and the money was lost. Held, that the banker was the agent of the treasurer and not of the district, and that the money was recoverable by the district in an action on the treasurer's bond." And it was said in the text of the opinion: "It was Ward's duty under the law to keep the money securely until properly directed, as before shown, to pay it over to the holder of the district bonds. The money was within his control, placed there by force of the statute, and if he saw fit to intrust it to the care of another, he did so at his peril." In the opinion in the case of State, Craig, v. Sheldon, 10 Neb. 452, in stating the liability of a treasurer for public funds, it was held: "The fact that the public funds have been stolen from the treasury is no legal justification for the failure of the treasurer to account for them." This was not a case, however, wherein the recovery of the public funds was the object of the action, but was one in the nature of a quo warranto to oust the defendant from the office of county treasurer of Greeley county; and, in reaching a conclusion as to whether the treasurer had been guilty of neglect of duty as an officer, it was observed: "This being the case, the county treasurer having failed to account for the moneys in his hands properly chargeable against him as treasurer, is guilty of wilful neglect of duty, and may be removed from office. And the fact that the moneys were stolen is no legal justification for the failure to account for them." While it may be said that these cases are not in point, and cannot be said to support the rule which holds treasurers to a strict accountability in respect to public funds which come into their possession as officers, for the reason that, strictly speaking, it was not the main question involved in either case, but only incidentally, yet it was necessarily connected with the matters under discussion, and which were determined, and made it necessary to pass upon it; and the decisions show what the opinion of the court was in regard to the responsibility of the treasurers for public money which they handled as officers.

It is argued that if the delivery of the certificate of deposit or check by Zutavern to Bush, when the latter assumed the duties of the office, was a sufficient payment to render Bush and his bondsmen responsible to the county for the amount thus paid, inasmuch as at the expiration of the first term of his services as treasurer, and assumption of the duties of the second term, January, 1892, he turned this $6,000 certificate of deposit over to himself as his own successor, this released the sureties herein sued, who signed his bond for the first term, and the action must fail as to them. Whatever might be said of this contention had the certificate of deposit in question, at the time of the termination of the first term during which Bush occupied the office of treasurer, retained its full force and vigor as a demand against the bank for the sum evidenced by its face, we must now recall to mind the fact that during the month of October, 1891, the bank, payor of the certificate, failed or quit business, had passed out of existence in the business world, and the certificate of deposit was no longer a demand against a living business being, but was merely evidence of a claim against what might at some time be realized of the assets of the bank which had failed, and was certainly not entitled to be considered as such a payment, when retained by Bush in making the change from his first to his second term of the amount of funds on hand, to him as his own successor, as to render or raise a liability for the amount of the certificate against him and his bondsmen for the second term, as a loss occurring during the second term, and certainly was not a paying over of the county funds which worked a release of the sureties who signed the bond for the first term. The failure to otherwise pay the sum expressed by the face of the certificate at the expiration of the first term of office was such a failure to faithfully discharge the duties of the office required by law, to faithfully account for and pay over all funds which had come into his hands or under his control by virtue of his office, as rendered him and the sureties for the first term liable therefor

A further contention is made on behalf of plaintiffs in error that the board of county commissioners had settled with Mr. Bush, comprehending in such settlement all his actions as county treasurer during his first term, and had examined his final account, and approved it, and made such approval a matter of record; that this constituted an adjudication of all these matters, which was final and conclusive; hence this action will not lie. Our statutory law requires the county treasurer to make periodical reports, which must show somewhat in detail the main transactions, more particularly in relation to disbursements of the public moneys and balances remaining on hand in the various funds; and these must be scrutinized and passed upon by the county board, and they make what is denominated a "settlement" with the treasurer. But, call it what you may, we are satisfied that it is nothing more than an examination of the account and report of the business acts of the treasurer during the period covered by it,—a scanning of such acts a "checking up," if the expression is allowable, by the county commissioners, the parties designated by law to attend to it, made in the interest of the public and the county, and for the benefit of the public and the county. Its main object and purpose are to maintain an espionage and supervision over the finances of the county, and their management by the treasurer, and secure, by such means, as great promptitude and care and exactitude in their management as possible. It is not in any sense or degree on behalf of the sureties on the bonds of officers. Their contract is that the officer will perform his duties faithfully and properly, and for any failure so to do they become liable. The law does not contemplate that the officer shall be watched by the county or its officers for the benefit of the sureties. It is no part of the contract with the sureties that it shall be done; and, where reports and settlements are required by law, it does not change the obligation of the sureties, or enter into their contract. It is their duty to see to it that the duties of the officer are faithfully discharged; and if the county board should be negligent or careless or irregular in an examination of an account or report of a treasurer, or in what is termed a "settlement," it would be no available defense to sureties on his bond in an action to recover an amount of public funds which the treasurer had failed to pay over. These periodical settlements assigned by our statutes to be made with county treasurers do not have the elements in them of a judicial determination of the subjects involved. It would not be contended that if the county commissioners state, as a matter of record, as the result of one of these so called "settlements," that the treasurer was short in his accounts in a stated sum, and consequently indebted to the county in such sum, this would constitute an adjudication of the whole matter; and, unless appealed from, it would be final and binding on the parties, and not open to attack No more can the result obtained by the examination be said to be binding and conclusive upon the county in regard to the amounts reported on hand by the treasurer being the exact true amounts; or their payments by the treasurer preclude the institution and successful prosecution of an action for any further sums which he has failed to report or to pay over. It can have no further or greater conclusiveness than any settlement made between private persons.

We are cited on this point in the case to the decision in the case of Ragoss v. Cuming County, 36 Neb. 375, as sustaining the position of plaintiffs in error, but we do not so read it. It was held: "Where the county board has before it a matter which it may reject or allow, and its action thereon will be final unless appealed from, its order in the premises cannot be attacked collaterally, except for fraud,"—which is entirely correct; but, in passing upon the report of a county treasurer, the board do not reject or allow it in the sense in which these words were used in the case referred to. It is only approved or disapproved, and not conclusively. In the same decision it is observed: "An officer who has faithfully performed the duties of his office and made a full settlement with the tribunal authorized to settle the same should be permitted to rest on such settlement, unless there is fraud, mistake, or imposition in making the same." The rule announced in the third paragraph of the syllabus to the case, which we have quoted, had reference to an order of the county board allowing the county clerk deputies, and the application of the fees of the office to the payment of their salaries, as fixed by the board, and was entirely applicable. What was said in the opinion in regard to the settlement was substantially the same as herein stated. Any settlement is all right, and entitled to stand in favor of an officer who had faithfully performed the duties of his office, and when, in the settlement, there is neither fraud, mistake, nor imposition. In support of what we have said in regard to these reports, and their examination and approval and settlement, see Craun v. Com. 84 Va. 282; Rose v. Douglass Twp. 52 Kan. 451; Waseca County Comrs. v. Sheehan, 42 Minn. 57, 5 L. R. A. 785; Britton v. Fort Worth, 78 Tex. 227.

In the case at bar it was shown by the testimony that, at the close of his first term, Mr. Bush made a report or account, which was examined by the county board. The statements of the commissioners' record in respect to the settlement had at that time were as follows: Under date January 29, 1892: "The county commissioners proceeded to settle with the county treasurer. The board adjourned to January 30 1892." Under date of January 30, 1892: "The board then proceeded to settle with the county treasurer. Board adjourned to February 1, 1892." Under date of February 1, 1892: "The board proceeded to settle with the county treasurer. Pending settlement, the board adjourned to February 2, 1892." Under date of February 2, 1892: "The board completed with the county treasurer." The account indicated the proper and true amount which had come into the possession of the county treasurer, or had been paid to him, as on hand; but it, in fact, included this certificate of deposit for $6 000, issued by the bank, which had, subsequent to such issuance, but prior to the time of settlement, failed. The fact that this was so included and counted by the treasurer as money on hand was not known by the county board. The funds were not asked for by the board, were not produced by the treasurer, and any approval of the account or report of the treasurer at that time was so made without any knowledge of the existence of the certificate of deposit, or that it figured or was claimed by the treasurer as a part of the moneys on hand. There was a mistake in the settlement, if any was made, to the amount evidenced by the certificate; and the paying over the funds shown by the report to be on hand by Bush to himself, to the extent that it consisted of his retaining this certificate, and counting it as so much money, was a failure to account and pay over the moneys of the county,—a failure to faithfully discharge the duties of his office, as required by law, and for which he and his bondsmen became liable.

It follows that the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

John VAN BOENING, Appt.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. In this state the common-law rule prevails that a proprietor may, by barriers or otherwise, protect his land from surface water coming from across adjacent lands; and, for injuries occasioned to others from a proper exercise of that right, he is not responsible.

2. If in the execution of such object, such proprietor is guilty of negligence which is the natural and proximate cause of injury to the adjoining proprietor, he is accountable therefor.

3. One may not accumulate surface waters on his own land, and, by means of a ditch, discharge them in a volume upon the land of another.

4. The former decisions of this court reviewed, and held to be in harmony with the foregoing principles.

5. Against a continuing injury to land caused by an unlawful discharge of surface waters by an adjoining proprietor, equity will afford relief by injunction.

6. In such case it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that actual injury occurred before the suit was brought. The remedy is in such case preventive, and will be granted on proof that the acts complained of, unless restrained, will result in damage.

7. To such an action it is no defense that the injury is in part threatened by the acts of another. The plaintiff has his remedy against each one contributing thereto.

8. Where one has a valid cause of action against another, his motive in instituting it is immaterial, and the fact that it is inspired by malice is no defense.

(April 10, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Adams County in favor of plaintiff in an action to restrain defendant from discharging surface water upon plaintiff's land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. H. Bowen and J. B. Cessna for appellant.

Messrs. Smith & McCreary, for appellee:

The owner of land has the absolute inherent right to keep and use it for such lawful purpose as he sees fit unmolested by the discharge of surface water thereon by another. If the injury inflicted by the unlawful discharge of surface water upon the land of another be serious and in its nature be permanent or such as would continue to operate in all future time, an injunction is a proper and the only adequate remedy.

Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 38 Neb. 406; Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138.

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:

This was an action by the appellee against the appellant for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining the appellant from maintaining a certain ditch, whereby it was alleged that waters collected on the lands of appellant were discharged upon the lands of plaintiff, to plaintiff's damage. The evidence is hopelessly conflicting, and in some parts very obscure. As there was a general finding for the plaintiff, we must take it in the light in which it most strongly tends to support the allegations of his petition. So considered, it appears hat the parties are owners of adjoining farms, the plaintiff's lying west of defendant's. Along the north line of these farms there is a highway. On the defendant's farm, and near the northeast corner thereof, there lie what the witnesses style two "lagoons." A review of the evidence discloses, however, that this term is used according to a local signification, and means merely a slight depression in the land, wherein, in wet seasons, surface water accumulates. It is quite evident that these are not permanent ponds or lakes. At some time in the past, a ditch was constructed near the middle of the highway, whereby the surface water from the vicinity was collected, and flowed along the highway westward into a ravine, or as we shall hereafter style it, using another local term, more accurately descriptive than any word of general use, a "draw." This draw crosses the highway north of plaintiff's land, passes over his land, and across defendant's towards the east. Shortly before this action was commenced, in accordance with some action by the county authorities, this ditch was filled up, and another one nearer the south side of the highway was constructed for the same purpose, and having the same outlet. The so called "lagoons," by means of smaller ditches, were connected with this ditch in the highway. The damage alleged is that, whereas the natural drainage from the lagoons is southeast, these ditches divert it to the north, and thence along the highway to the draw; discharging a large body of water thereby across plaintiff's lands, cutting trenches, and covering them with accretions. It also appears that, by the construction of a ditch much shorter than the one now maintained, the defendant might discharge the water from the lagoons into this same draw upon his own land.

One point urged in support of the appeal is that there is no evidence that, down to the time of the trial, any large quantity of water had been discharged by reason of the ditches in question, or that plaintiff's lands had been in fact injured. It is true that there is very little evidence to the contrary, but we regard this as immaterial. The plaintiff was not obliged to wait until the injury had been inflicted. There is ample evidence tending to show that such an injury, in the event of a wet season, would be the result of maintaining the ditches, and the remedy sought is preventive, and not compensatory. Another point urged is that the action should properly be against the county, because the damage, if any, is directly inflicted by the ditch in the highway. While the prayer of the petition seems to extend to all the ditches, the district court granted the injunction only so far as to restrain the defendant from maintaining the ditches connecting the lagoons with the ditch in the highway. Assuming for the moment that any wrong was committed by maintaining this system of ditches, the defendant was the responsible person to the extent of the water discharged by the ditch the maintenance of which was restrained. The fact that the plaintiff may have a remedy against the county or against other proprietors for similar acts contributing to the same injury does not deprive him of his remedy against the defendant for his share therein.

Another minor point may here be disposed of. The district court excluded testimony accompanied by an offer to show that the plaintiff and others had conspired together to institute criminal and civil actions against Van Boening, contributing to the expense thereof, and with the purpose of harassing him until he should leave the township. This would be no defense to this action. If, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff had a good cause of action against the defendant, his motives in prosecuting it are immaterial.

With these preliminary matters cleared away, the question remains whether the plaintiff was entitled to relief against the defendant for discharging surface water through a ditch, in a volume, upon plaintiff's land, contrary to the natural course of drainage; and the proof showing that as effective and as convenient a method of discharging water might have been availed of without discharging it on the highway or on plaintiff's land. That, for a wrong of this kind, injunction is an appropriate remedy, was held in Davis v. Londgreen, 8 Neb. 43. That one's right to protect his land against surface water does not extend so far as to permit him to collect it in a volume, and by means of a ditch, to discharge it upon the land of another, has been several times decided. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138; Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Adams, 41 Neb. 737; Bunderson v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 43 Neb. 545.

There are other cases applying the principle, but we do not cite them, for the reason that they seem rather to relate to the diversion of watercourses than of surface water. The announcement of the rule referred to is sufficient to dispose of this case. But, as it developed upon the argument that an impression prevails that the different decisions of the court have not been altogether harmonious upon the subject, it seems well to review these cases, which to our minds are in complete harmony, and to as clearly as possible state the principle which has governed all the decisions.

Prior to 1893 there was no case dealing with the general principles of law on the subject. Davis v. Londgreen, supra, was much like the present, except that it would seem that the pond which had been drained was permanent in its character, and not a mere depression, in which surface water occasionally collected. It was held that such water could not lawfully, by means of a ditch, be discharged upon the lands of one's neighbors. Pyle v. Richards, 17 Neb. 180, was a case for the diversion of a stream; and, while it has been cited in several surface-water cases, it was in fact governed by different principles. Stewart v. Schneider, 22 Neb. 286, depended for its solution entirely upon the effect of a prior decree fixing the rights of the parties, the correctness of which was not, and could not have been, then questioned. Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 38 Neb. 406, is perhaps the leading case on the subject. It was there announced that the common-law rule prevails, and that, therefore, one has the right to defend himself against surface water, and that incidental damage inflicted upon another by such acts is damnum absque injuria. It is this case which is thought to be in conflict with some of the others. The opinion is entirely too long to abstract here, but an examination of the case discloses that the court had always in view the fact that there was neither allegation nor proof that the railroad embankment which had caused the injury had been unnecessarily or negligently constructed. The district court gave an instruction to the effect that one might upon his own land erect such barriers as he deemed necessary to keep off surface water falling upon it or coming from adjacent lands, and for any consequent injury to other lands he would not be responsible; but that such waters as fell upon his own lands, or came thereon by surface drainage, he must keep within the boundaries, or permit them to flow off without artificial interference, unless, within the limits of his own lands, he could turn them into a natural watercourse. Commenting upon this instruction, this court, through Commissioner Ryan, said: "In the latter part of this instruction it is barely possible that the court may have erred, as against the defendant, in holding that it was the affirmative duty of the proprietor to keep within his boundary, or permit to flow off without interference, such waters as fall in rain or snow on his land, or come by surface drainage, unless, within the limits of his own land, he can turn them into a natural watercourse. It is unnecessary to determine this question." In many of the cases cited in the opinion the distinction was clearly drawn between a proper defense against surface water and a negligent defense. This case, then, merely established the general rule; but there was kept constantly in view the fact that no negligence appeared, and that the existence of negligence might be a controlling feature. In Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Adams, supra, while the rule was very briefly stated in accordance with former opinions that a proprietor may not collect surface waters on his own estate in a ditch, and discharge them in a volume on the land of his neighbor, it is quite evident that the same principle was in view, and that this was deemed a negligent method of protecting one's self. In Anheuser-Busch Brew. Asso. v. Peterson, 41 Neb. 897, a proprietor, in order to protect himself against surface water, filled in his lots, but in such a manner that water which otherwise would have passed off in another direction accumulated and entered the ice house of plaintiff through a privy vault. The rule in Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. supra, was stated; and the court, through Judge Post, said: "Subject to that rule, every proprietor may lawfully improve his property by doing what is reasonably necessary for that purpose, and unless he is guilty of some act of negligence in the manner of its execution, he will not be answerable to his neighbor, although he may thereby cause the surface water to flow upon or from the premises of the latter to his damage. The injury in such case is but a mere incident to the proper use of the owner's property; but if in the execution of the enterprise in hand he is guilty of negligence, which is the natural and proximate cause of injury to the adjoining proprietor, the law holds him accountable therefor. Such is the essence of the authorities cited in Morrissey v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. supra, and undoubtedly the law of this case." In Bunderson v. Burlington & M. R. Co. supra, it was held that the construction of a railroad embankment whereby water had been backed up upon the lands of a superior proprietor was no cause of action, and this for the reason that to have made an opening or culvert would have discharged the water in a volume upon the lands of an inferior proprietor, which would have been tortious. In Lincoln & B. H. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 44 Neb. 526, the railroad company was held liable because of its negligence in the construction of an embankment; and the words above quoted from Anheuser-Busch Brew. Asso. v. Peterson, supra, were quoted with approval, as controlling the case. In Beatrice v. Leary, 45 Neb. 149, it was said: "The doctrine of this court is the rule of the common law, that surface water is a common enemy, and that an owner may defend his premises against it by dike or embankment, and if damages result to adjoining proprietors by reason of such defense, he is not liable therefor; but this rule is a general one, and subject to another common law rule, that a proprietor must so use his own property as not to unnecessarily and negligently injure his neighbor; and therefore every proprietor may lawfully improve his property by doing what is reasonably necessary for that purpose, and, unless guilty of some act of negligence in the manner of its execution, will not be answerable to an adjoining proprietor, although he may thereby cause the surface water to flow on the premises of the latter, to his damage; but if, in the execution of such enterprise he is guilty of negligence, which is the natural and proximate cause of injury to his neighbor, he is accountable therefor."

We think the foregoing review of the cases shows that, instead of there existing any conflict in the decisions, it has been the settled and uniform rule, applied in every case, that, while one may protect his land from surface water, he is responsible for any negligence in so doing occasioning damage to his neighbor. The case is no different from the exercise of any other undoubted right. I have as much right to drive along the highway as I have to defend my land from surface water; but if I drive negligently, and injure some one, I am responsible. We think, in view of this principle, the evidence amply sustained the finding and decree of the district court.

Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Marilla B. CARMICHAEL, Appt.,
v.
Ada M. LATHROP et al.

(.....Mich.....)

Legacies to daughters of a testator are adeemed, at least pro tanto, by his conveyance to them of lands by way of gift, in the absence of any apparent or expressed intent to the contrary.

(February 26, 1896.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel the conveyance of certain real estate which defendants had received under the will of Henry P. Pulling, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fraser & Gates, for appellant:

The residuary bequests to defendants were respectively satisfied to the amount of the value of the property given them.

The general rule as to the leaning of courts of equity against double portions, and the satisfaction of legacies by advancements, is familiar. But this rule was long subject to many artificial restrictions.

1. It could not be applied to a residuary bequest.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1115.

2. If there was a difference, even in the time of payment, it was no satisfaction.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1121.

3. So if the advancement was not ejusdem generis with the legacy.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1109.

These technical obstacles are all now practically obsolete.

A bequest of a residue or a part of a residue will now be satisfied, in whole or in part, by a subsequent settlement, if the circumstances are such as otherwise bring the case within the presumption.

Montefiore v. Guedalla, 1 De G. F. & J. 93; Lady Thynne v. Earl Glengall, 2 H. L. Cas. 131; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 558.

The doctrine of ejusdem generis is now practically a thing of the past.

1. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 564; Lord Chichester v. Coventry, L. R. 2 H. L. 71; Lady Thynne v. Earl Glengall, supra; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 557; Hauberger v. Root, 5 Pa. 108; Richards v. Humphreys, 15 Pick. 133; Van Houton v. Post, 32 N. J. Eq. 709; Wallace v. Du Bois, 65 Md. 153; Snell v. Tuttle, 44 Hun, 324.

Were we dealing merely with a devise and a subsequent advance of real property, complainant ought nevertheless to have a decree.

2 Bl. Com. 491, 493, 500; Lansing v. Haynes, 95 Mich. 16; Hansbrough v. Hoge, 12 Leigh, 316, 37 Am. Dec. 659; Thomas v. Capps, 5 Bush, 273; Marshall v. Rench, 3 Del. Ch. 239.

The fact that the defendants get their title by will, and that the trust is not expressed in the will, is no reason why the same should not be enforced.

Sellack v. Harris, 5 Vin. Abr. 521; Stickland v. Aldridge, 9 Ves. Jr 516; Podmore v. Gunning, 7 Sim. 644; 1 Lewin, Tr. *61, 62, and notes.

Such a trust may be established by proving the transaction out of which it is implied, and such proof may be by parol testimony.

Ripley v. Seligman, 88 Mich. 179; How. Anno. Stat. § 6182; Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. Jr. 696, 5 Ves. Jr. 308; Tawney v. Crowther, 3 Bro. Ch. 161, 318; O'Hara v. O'Neill, 7 Bro. P. C. 227; Lewin, Tr. 63; Roberts, Stat. Fr. 101, 102.

When there is any written evidence showing that the person apparently entitled is not really so, parol evidence may be admitted to show the trust under which he actually holds the estate.

Mr. Charles A. Kent, for appellees:

The subject of advancements is regulated wholly by statute, and the decisions in England and the United States are all based on a construction of the various statutes.

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 220; 2 Woerner, American Law of Administration, p. 1224; 2 Wms. Exrs. pp. 1285, 1287, note b; Power v. Power, 91 Mich. 587; Beebe v. Estabrook, 79 N. Y. 246.

The Michigan statutes provide for deduction of advancements only in the case of intestate estates.

How. Anno. Stat. § 5777*a; Thompson* v. Carmichael, 3 Sandf. Ch. 120; Kent v. Hopkins, 86 Hun, 611; Marshall v. Rench, 3 Del. Ch. 239.

No doubt the deduction of advances may be provided in a will, or advances may be made in the manner provided by statute and a will subsequently made. But in such cases the rights of the parties depend entirely on the construction of the will.

Re Turner's Estate, 48 Mich. 369, 52 Mich. 398; McClintock's Appeal, 58 Mich. 152.

There is no evidence that the testator intended his gifts as advances. The statute provides the only admissible evidence of advancements.

How. Anno. Stat. § 5780; Power v. Power, supra; Bigelow v. Poole, 10 Gray, 105; Weatherhead v. Field, 26 Vt. 665.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction of a suit concerning advances. Such a matter belongs to the probate court.

How. Anno. Stat. § 5978; McClintock's Appeal, supra; Woerner, American Law of Administration, § 552; People, Campau, v. Wayne County Circuit Ct. 11 Mich. 393, 83 Am. The conveyance of real estate after the making of a will is held not a satisfaction of any legacy in whole or in part, even though that was the clear intent of the testator.

Woerner, American Law of Administration, p. 978; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 98; Burnham v. Comfort, 108 N. Y. 535; Swails v. Swails, 98 Ind. 511; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716; Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb. 9; Marshall v. Rench, supra.

No intention of the testator, unless shown in the way the statute requires, could make that change in his will which complainant seeks to enforce.

Lansing v. Haynes, 95 Mich. 16.

Though a legacy may, a devise of real estate cannot, be adeemed by the conveyance of a portion during the testator's lifetime.

Davys v. Boucher, 3 Younge & C. Exch. 397.

No general provisions of a will, whether a devise or a legacy, can be changed by any conveyance of property during the lifetime of the testator.

Burnham v. Comfort, Arthur v. Arthur, and Lansing v. Haynes, supra.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The will of Henry P. Pulling was executed in June, 1872. After giving his wife the use and enjoyment of all of his property during life, in lieu of dower, it provided that: "Second. All the remainder of the estate of, in, and to my said property, both real and personal, subject to the said life estate of my said wife, I give, devise, and bequeath to my three daughters, Ada M. Lathrop, of Detroit, Michigan, Emily Lloyd, of Albany, New York, and Marilla B. Carmichael, of Amsterdam, New York, and to their heirs forever, share and share alike. . . . Third, I hereby authorize and empower my hereinafter named executors to sell and convey in fee simple absolute, in their discretion, any portion or all of my real estate, with a view of otherwise investing the proceeds thereof, or to change my present securities into real investments. But such change is to be done with the consent of my wife, and the approval of the probate court or a court of chancery. And this power and authority of so selling and conveying in fee simple absolute my real estate is hereby made notwithstanding the bequests which are given to my daughters, which bequests are hereby made subservient to said power. And I do hereby direct my executors to invest all my moneys and property, and the avails of all real estate so sold, in first class, unincumbered real-estate mortgages, or in United States bonds or Michigan state bonds, said securities to be held and retained by them, and the income thereof paid quarter yearly, or, at the furthest, every half year, by them, to my said wife, until her decease, and on such death my estate is to be closed up and distributed as provided for in the second clause of this my will. And lastly I do hereby appoint my brother Abraham C. Pulling, of New York City, my brother in-law William P. Bridgman, of Detroit, and my son in-law Joseph Lathrop, of Detroit, to be the executors of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills by me made." Mr. Pulling died in July 1890, and the will was probated August 19, 1890. Joseph Lathrop qualified as executor. The probate records show that at the time of the testator's death he was seised in fee of real estate to the value of $65,000, that there was due to him upon land contracts $45,000, that he owned other personal property to the amount of $30,000, and that there were no debts or claims against the estate. Previous to the death of the testator, he conveyed to each of the defendants a parcel of real estate; that conveyed to Mrs. Lloyd being alleged to be worth $14,000, and that received by Mrs. Lathrop said to be worth $10,000. There is evidence tending to show that he intended to repair the house upon Mrs. Lathrop's property, thereby making the gift to her equal to that of Mrs. Lloyd, and that he intended to do as well by his other daughter, the complainant; but her husband became embarrassed, and finally went to state's prison, and she never received a home, as the others had. Her father, however, gave to her money from time to time, for her support, which aggregated $1,100. Soon after the probate of the will, litigation arose between the widow and children, which was finally adjusted, and the property was divided, the parties executing the necessary deeds and other instruments to carry it into effect. The accounts of Lathrop, the executor, were settled, and he was discharged. There is now some land held in common by the three sisters.

The complainant files the bill in this cause, alleging that the lands conveyed by the testator to her two sisters should be treated as ademptions of their respective legacies, and that they should be required to account to her for her share thereof. She alleges that her father so intended, and that they recognized the justice thereof, and promised to see that she received the same, and, relying upon such promises, she consented to the settlement of the estate, expecting that her sisters would pay her an amount equal to her share of said parcels so received by them. It seems tacitly agreed that this record involves only the question whether the property conveyed to Mrs. Lloyd and Mrs. Lathrop before the testator's death should be applied upon their respective interests under the will, or, in other words, as the counsel for the complainant state it, whether it can be treated as ademption or a satisfaction pro tanto of their bequests. We are perhaps at liberty to assume from the pleadings and admitted facts that the defendants received sufficient personal property under the will to more than cover the claim of the complainant; in other words, that they have received bequests to such amount in addition to any lands that they may have received. As to such personal property, the will made the sisters' legatees, although they may have been also devisees as to the real estate if the contention of the defendants' counsel is correct. In other words, they are none the less legatees, taking bequests of personal property, because one and the same provision of the will gave them both personal and real property. Hence we need spend no time upon the question whether the terms of the will made them devisees, as there are legacies sufficient to support the ademption contended for. We can therefore eliminate some of the questions which arise where an attempt is made to apply the doctrine of satisfaction to a devise of real property by reason of the conveyance to the devisee of other property. The case is one where it is claimed that a gift of personal property by will may be satisfied by a conveyance of land, when such is the clear intention of the testator. If a person should bequeath to another a sum of money, and, previous to his (the testator's) death, should pay to such person the same amount, upon the express understanding that it was to discharge the bequest, the legacy would be thereby adeemed. But, in the absence of an apparent or expressed intention, that would not ordinarily be the effect of the payment of a sum of money to a legatee under an existing will. Generally, such payment would not affect the legacy. To this rule there is an exception, where the testator is a parent of or stands to the legatee in loco parentis. In such case the payment would be presumed to be an ademption of the legacy. At first blush this impresses one as an unreasonable rule, as it puts the stranger legatee upon a better footing than the testator's own son, and judges and law-writers have severely condemned the rule. See Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1110–1113. It has been said that "this rule has excited the regret and censure of more than one eminent modern judge, although it has met with approbation from other high authorities." Wms. Exrs. 1332. Story's condemnation of it is strong, but he adds, "We must be content to declare it a lex scripta est. It is established, though it may not be entirely approved." And Worden, J., in Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 5, says, "Whatever may be thought of the doctrine, it is thoroughly established in English and American jurisprudence." Shudal v. Jekyll, 2 Atk. 518; 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th ed. p. 741; Van Houten v. Post, 33 N. J. Eq. 344; Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. Jr. 140. With a refinement of logic, characteristic, the early English judges held that the intention to adeem a legacy is to be presumed from the advancement of a part of the legacy, on the theory that it was the testator's right to do so, and that he must be presumed to be the best judge of the propriety of a revocation; but the rigor of this rule has been relaxed, and cannot now be said to be the law. Ex parte Pye, supra; Pym v. Lockyer, 5 Myl. & C. 29, 55; Montague v. Montague, 15 Beav. 565; Wms. Exrs. 1333; Hopwood v. Hopwood, 7 H. L. Cas. 728; Wallace v. Du Bois, 65 Md. 153, 159. See cases cited 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 555, note 3. There are cogent reasons in support of the rule stated,—i. e. that payment to a son adeems the legacy,—which is based on the theory that such legacy is to be considered as a portion, and that the father's natural inclination to treat his children alike renders it more probable that his payment was in the nature of an advancement than a discrimination in favor of one, oftentimes the least worthy. Double portions were considered inequitable, and upon this the doctrine rests. Suisse v. Lord Lowther, 2 Hare, 427. While the authorities are a unit that a legacy by one in loco parentis will be adeemed by payment, in the absence of an apparent or expressed intent to the contrary, the doctrine was early restricted. Among other limitations was the rule that the presumption could not be applied to a residuary bequest, because the court would not presume that a legacy of a residue, or other indefinite amount, had been satisfied by an advancement, as the testator might be ignorant whether the benefit that he was conferring equaled that which he had already willed. Freemantle v. Bankes, 5 Ves. Jr. 85; Clendening v. Clymer, 17 Ind. 155; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1115. This exception fell with the discarding of the rule that satisfaction must be in full. Pym v. Lockyer, 5 Myl. & C. 29; Montefiore v. Guedalla, 1 De G. F. & J. 93. Again, it was held that it could not be applied unless the advancement was ejusdem generis with the legacy. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1109. Counsel for the defendant contends that "the conveyance of real estate after the making of a will is held not a satisfaction of any legacy, in whole or in part, even though that was the clear intent of the testator," and he cites several authorities to sustain the proposition. In Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb. 9, it was held that "a conveyance made subsequent to a devise of land is not a revocation, or satisfaction, of a devise of other lands to the grantee. But if the conveyance be of a portion of the same land, that is a revocation pro tanto." This was a case where the court found that the grantor intended and the grantee expected the land conveyed would be in lieu of the grantee's share under the will. It was said that to hold that the conveyance was a satisfaction was to hold that the will might be revoked by implication, which could not be tolerated under the statute of frauds. This case contains an elaborate discussion of the subject, and cites many of the earlier authorities bearing upon it. The court of appeals considered the subject in Burnham v. Comfort, 108 N. Y. 535. In this case it was claimed that a devise of real property was satisfied by the payment of money, on the express understanding, evidenced by the receipt of the devisee, that it was received as a part of her father's estate. The court said that to sustain such claim they must hold that it operated as a revocation of the will, which would contravene "the spirit, if not the letter" of the statute of frauds, and that the proposition "lacked support in principle as well as authority." The opinion then asserts that "the rule of ademption is predicable of legacies of personal estate, and not applicable to devises of realty." After discussing the question of intention, and intimating that, while a presumption of intention that the gift should be in satisfaction would exist if the case were one involving a legacy, it would not in case of a devise, it proceeds to show that the statute of frauds, which extends to wills, was an unsurmountable barrier to the application of the rule contended for, as to devises. Two members of the court dissented. The supreme court of South Carolina, in the case of Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716, had occasion to consider a case where the legatees were also devisees, as in the present case. It was held that payments of money were to be considered as made in satisfaction of the legacies, but not the devises. The court said: "It would seem that upon the same principles, devises of real estate ought likewise to be adeemed (if such a term can, with any propriety, be applied to devises) by subsequent payments to the devisees with the intention of producing that result; but it is conceded that the doctrine of ademption has never been applied to devises of real estate and in the absence of any authority, we do not feel justified in disregarding the well-established line which has for ages been drawn between real and personal estate, even though we may be thereby compelled to thwart the obvious intention of the testator, and disturb the distribution of his property which he thought was proper and just to his descendants. For while the intention of the testator is the cardinal rule of construction of a will, yet such intention cannot be given effect where it is in conflict with the rules of law. A devise of real estate cannot, like a pecuniary legacy, be affected by any subsequent transactions between the testator and the devisee, but must stand until it is revoked or altered in the manner prescribed by law." Attention is also called to the case of Swails v. Swails, 98 Ind. 511. In this case land was devised as follows: 88 acres to J.; 36 acres to N. Subsequently the testator conveyed portions of the same land as follows, viz.: 60 acres to J., the son; and 40 acres to N., a grandson. It was held that the deeds did not revoke the devise of the 24 acres to N., and that the doctrine of ademption does not apply to specific devises of real estate, nor where the devisor does not stand in loco parentis. The case followed Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 1, where it was held that the doctrine of ademption of legacies by advancement to the legatee by the testator in his lifetime has no application to devises of real estate. Again, in Campbell v. Martin, 87 Ind. 577, it is said: "But we know of no reason whatever for the extension of the doctrine, and making it applicable to devises of real estate." In Marshall v. Rench, 3 Del. Ch. 239, the court admits that in some cases a conveyance to a devisee after the making of the will would operate in like manner as the ademption of a legacy,—e. g. where the conveyance to the devisee is of the same land,—because "by such a conveyance the testator executes his devise, precisely as the settlement of a portion on a legatee is an ademption of the legacy." The court adds that "the conveyance to a devisee of lands other than those devised, or of an interest in lands different from that devised, has never been held an implied revocation of the devise." The authorities cited in support of this are all ancient, except Arthur v. Arthur, hereinbefore discussed. We mention at this point the fact that all of these were cases where the attack was made upon a devise, merely, except the South Carolina case, and in that case the claim of ademption was sustained as to the legacies. 2 Woerner, American Law of Administration, p. 978, is cited in support of defendants' contention. This author dismisses the subject with the statement that "specific legacies are said not to be affected by the subsequent advancement of a portion, because the gift of specific articles of personal property by a father to his child is not presumed to be intended as a portion. And for the same reason real estate devised is held not to come within the rule; but this exception is repudiated in Virginia, and unfavorably commented on elsewhere." See Hansbrough v. Hooe, 12 Leigh, 316, 37 Am. Dec. 659.

The authorities cited have been commented on at length for the purpose of showing that they differ from the case before us, inasmuch as they were cases where it was sought to treat conveyances as satisfactions of devises. This is not a case where an attempt is made to deprive a devisee of title to land willed to him, but it is claimed that the presumption that a bequest to a son is satisfied pro tanto by a gift is not to be applied where the gift is of land instead of money, or other personal property ejusdem generis. In Richards v. Humphreys, 15 Pick. 140, will be found the following dictum of Shaw, Ch. J.: "We have seen that ademption depends solely on the will of the testator, and not at all upon the ability of the party receiving to give a valid discharge. Had the money been paid to trustees or others for her benefit, without any act or consent of hers, if given expressly in lieu or in satisfaction of such legacy to her, it would have operated as an ademption. Had he purchased a house or other property in her name, and for her benefit, with the like intent and purpose expressed, it would have had the same effect." It is apparent that the law looks upon a legacy to a son as a setting off of his portion. Also, it is plain that a subsequent gift, unless it be of real estate, is presumed to be in satisfaction pro tanto of the legacy. It is also settled that whether the gift is to be considered an ademption of a legacy must depend upon the intent of the testator alone. A gift of personal property to a son may be shown not to have been so intended, but the burden is upon the legatee. Ford v. Tynte, 2 Hem. & M. 324. A gift to a stranger may be shown to have been intended as an ademption, but here the presumption is the other way, the burden being upon the administrator to show such intent. There can be no doubt that a testator's conveyance of real property may constitute an ademption, if he so intends it, e. g. where he expresses the intent in the conveyance, and possibly in other ways. If so, the only significance of the doctrine ejusdem generis is its effect upon the presumption. The doctrine that the property conveyed must be ejusdem generis appears to be the only ground upon which it can be said that the conveyance in this case should not be treated as satisfaction pro tanto. It has been said in early cases that "when the gift by will and the portion are not ejusdem generis, the presumption will be repelled. Thus, land will not be presumed to be intended as a satisfaction for money, nor money for land." Bellasis v. Uthwatt, 1 Atk. 428; Goodfellow v. Burchett, 2 Vern. 298; Ray v. Stanhope, 2 Rep. in Ch. 159; Lady Saville v. Saville, 2 Atk. 458; Grave v. Earl Salisbury, 1 Bro. Ch. 425. But see Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. Jr. 507. The courts have not accepted without protest the proposition that the application of the presumption arising from the relation of parent and child should depend upon the similarity of the property willed and donated, and it has been asked "why, if a gift of a thousand dollars will satisfy a legacy of that amount, it should not equally be satisfied by a donation of lands of equal value." And see Pym v. Lockyer, 5 Myl. & C. 44. But all agree that ademption is a matter of intent. In Jones v. Mason, 5 Rand. (Va.) 577, 16 Am. Dec. 761, the court said: "The whole class of cases depends upon the intention." In Hoskins v. Hoskins, Prec. in Ch. 263, it is said: "I answer, it still shows that intention is everything; ejusdem generis nothing." In Chapman v. Salt, 2 Vern. 646, it was said, "showing that intention is everything." Again: "It is laid down generally that a residuary legacy will not adeem a portion due under a settlement, because it is entirely uncertain what that legacy may be. But this rule, like the rest, yields to intention." Rickman v. Morgan, 1 Bro. Ch. 63, 2 Bro. Ch. 394. In Bengough v. Walker, supra, it was held that a bequest of a share in powder works, charged with an annuity, was a satisfaction of a portion of $2,000, when it was so intended. See also Gill's Estate, Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 139. It is forcefully argued that these cases make obsolete the doctrine of ejusdem generis. Whether they do or not, they certainly show that it must yield to the testator's intent. We cannot, therefore, accede to the proposition of counsel for the defendants "that the conveyance of real estate will not be held a satisfaction of any legacy in whole or in part, even though the intent of the testator is clear." We think the testimony shows the testator's intent. There may be testimony in the record that was incompetent to prove it, but there is sufficient that was competent. The widow was conversant with the entire transaction, and the defendants' statements are admissions of their knowledge of such intentions.

It is contended that "the allowance of a conveyance of property as a satisfaction of a devise or legacy would be equivalent to a revocation of the will in part, and it would have to be proved in the manner provided by our statute for the revocation of wills, e. g. by the destruction of the will, or the making of a new will." How. Anno. Stat. § 5793; Lansing v. Haynes, 95 Mich. 16. We think it should not be called a revocation of the will. The defendants' bequests are permitted to stand unquestioned, and matter in discharge of the obligation (i. e. payment) is shown. The will is not overturned or revoked. It is satisfied.

We think the prayer of the bill should be granted, and the record should be remanded to the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne, in chancery, for further proceedings. Decreed accordingly.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

FISHER, BROWN, & COMPANY
v.
William I. FIELDING, Appt.

(67 Conn. 91.)

1. An allegation that a foreign judgment was "duly adjudged" is sufficient to show jurisdiction and notice to the defendant and the fact that a hearing or trial was had.

2. Service on a foreigner temporarily in the country, made on the eve of his departure, is sufficient to give jurisdiction to render judgment against him, although the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction.

3. An averment that plaintiffs well

NOTE.—Conclusiveness of judgment rendered in a foreign country.

Since the note on this question with the case of Dunstan v. Higgins (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 668, was made, the Supreme Court of the United States has very fully considered the subject in the case of Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 40 L. ed. 95.

In a very elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Gray the authorities are reviewed and the conclusion reached that an executory judgment rendered in a foreign country in favor of a citizen or resident thereof against a foreigner is not in all cases conclusive against the latter in an action brought in his own country to enforce the judgment. The court adopts the rule of reciprocity as a part of international jurisprudence with respect to foreign judgments. It holds that a judgment rendered in a foreign country should have the same effect only knew that defendant was not indebted to them and that the only claim they could have was one against a corporation of which he was an officer is not sufficient to show such fraud as will make a foreign judgment against him reviewable on its merits.

4. An English judgment rendered by default against a citizen of Connecticut after personal service made on him while temporarily in England and upon the eve of his departure is conclusive as to the merits, in the absence of fraud, although the cause of action did not arise in England.

5. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to identify the plaintiffs in an action on a foreign judgment in favor of a partnership as those to whom the description of the judgment creditors in the record by partnership name properly applies.

(Hamersley, J., dissents.)

(December 16, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a judgment which plaintiff had recovered against defendant in England. Affirmed.

The complaint alleged that on April 3, 1889, at Birmingham, in the Kingdom of Great Britain, the high court of justice, queen's bench division, Birmingham district registry, in an action therein pending between plaintiffs and defendant, duly adjudged that defendant should pay to plaintiffs the sum of £293 13s 3d damages, and £4 14s costs. A demurrer was interposed on the ground that the complaint failed to contain proper allegations as to the jurisdiction of said court, or that defendant was summoned to appear, or did appear, or that there was any hearing or trial. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered by general denial. Three special defenses were also pleaded, and, on demurrer, held insufficient.

Mr. Frank L. Hungerford, for appellant:

Our government owes it to all its citizens to see that they have at least one fair opportunity to try their causes at such times, in such places, and under such circumstances that justice—not necessarily justice according to the idea of the nation in whose tribunals the cause has been tried, but justice according to the American idea—has been done.

It is no part of our policy to restrict legislation in the world generally. In the case where a foreign judgment is set up as conclusive, we have not as yet afforded the one fair opportunity to litigate the question upon its original merits, which it is the obligation of government to furnish.

as the courts of that country allow to judgments of the country in which the judgment in question is sought to be executed. Therefore, it holds that a judgment rendered in France against a citizen of this country is only prima facie evidence of the justice of the plaintiff's claim, in the absence of any statute or treaty on the subject, when suit is brought in this country, since by the laws of France judgments of other countries are reviewable upon the merits.

But while such French judgment is allowed to be re-examined upon the merits, it is held that it is not sufficient ground for impeaching it that plaintiff was allowed to testify without being sworn or cross-examined, if this was in accordance with the laws of the country. It is further held that, in the absence of anything to show prejudice in the court or in the system of laws under which it was sitting, or fraud in procuring the judgment, or any other special reason why the comity of nations should not allow it full effect, the foreign judgment ought not to be re-examined upon the merits as on a new trial or appeal upon the mere assertion that it was erroneous in law or in fact, if it was rendered upon regular proceedings after opportunity for a full and fair trial before a court of competent jurisdiction and after due citation or voluntary appearance of the defendant under a system of jurisprudence likely to secure an impartial administration of justice between citizens and foreigners.

The effect of a judgment rendered in Canada when suit upon it is brought in this country is also considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Ritchie v. McMullen, 159 U. S. 235, 40 L. ed. 133, where it is held that a judgment rendered in Canada by a competent court against a citizen of the United States is conclusive as to the merits in the absence of fraud in procuring it or other special ground for not allowing it full effect, since by the law of England prevailing in Canada any judgment rendered by an American court under like circumstances would be allowed full and conclusive effect.

Other recent cases as to conclusiveness of judgments in foreign countries are as follows:

By a circuit court of the United States it is held in Carlsbad v. Kutnow, 68 Fed. Rep. 794, that an English decision granting an application for the registry of a trademark can have no effect in another jurisdiction, even as against a party who opposed the application.

The rule in Canada respecting the judgment of foreign courts is declared in Law v. Hansen, 25 Can. S. C. 69, by giving such judgments the same force in Canada as res judicata that they have in the foreign country. It is held that a defendant in Nova Scotia who brought an unsuccessful action in a foreign court against the plaintiff cannot invoke the provision of N. S. Rev. Stat. 5th Series, chap. 104, that evidence of a judgment recovered in a foreign country shall not be conclusive in Nova Scotia of its correctness in an action upon such judgment.

In Manitoba it is held that defendant in an action on a foreign judgment cannot set up a defense which might have been made to the original cause of action if it had been brought in that country but which could not be raised in a foreign court under Man. Rev. Stat. chap. 1, § 39, allowing any defense which might have been pleaded to the original cause of action. British Linen Co. v. McEwan, 8 Manitoba L. Rep. 99.

The decree of a foreign court of admiralty as to the distribution of the surplus from the sale of the cargo of a wrecked vessel after payment therefrom of a salvor's claim is held not to be conclusive if notice of the proceedings was not served upon the owner of the vessel and cargo and those claiming liens thereon. China Mut. Ins. Co. v. Force, 142 N. Y. 90.

And it is held that an action upon a foreign judgment is not defeated by the pendency of an appeal from it, although execution may be stayed until the appeal is determined. Howland v. Codd, 9 Manitoba L. Rep. 435.

2 Freem. Judgm. 4th ed. ¶ 597; Hilton v. Guyott, 42 Fed. Rep. 249.

The plaintiffs in the English suit, Fisher, Brown, & Co., had no just claim against the defendant, and they knew it; they took advantage of the defendant's temporary presence in England to obtain a judgment to which they knew they were not entitled; their object in suing him in England was to embarrass him and to prevent his having a fair opportunity to resist an unjust demand; they sought to obtain an unjust and unfair advantage over the defendant, and the judgment thus obtained is the one that this court is asked to hold conclusive. Such a judgment cannot be recognized here.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs' complaint was drawn in the form authorized by the Practice Book (No. 169, p. 107) in actions on a foreign judgment. In actions on a domestic judgment the authorized forms (Practice Book, Nos. 166, 167, pp. 106, 107) state the fact, but not the manner, of its recovery; but in declaring on the judgment of a foreign court the approved averment is that such court, "in an action therein pending between the plaintiffs and the defendant, duly adjudged that the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs" the sum in question. No court can "duly" adjudge such a payment except in an action conducted in due course of law. Due course or process of law, with respect to such a judicial proceeding, necessarily involves reasonable notice to the defendant of the institution and nature of the action, given (unless this be waived), if he be a nonresident, by personal service within the jurisdiction, and a fair opportunity to be heard before a tribunal of competent jurisdiction. So much is due to every person from whom another seeks to recover in a judicial controversy before a court of justice. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733, 24 L. ed. 565, 572. In the case of a domestic judgment, it is unnecessary to allege that these conditions have been fulfilled, because our law requires it, and it is to be presumed that the law has been obeyed. In respect to a foreign judgment, nothing can safely be taken for granted, and the Practice Book has therefore provided a different form of complaint. The practice act was designed to simplify our legal procedure, and to abbreviate pleadings by the omission of all unnecessary allegations. The demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not allege that the high court of justice, queen's bench division, Birmingham district registry, had jurisdiction of the action or of the parties or of the subject matter, nor that the defendant had notice of its pendency or was summoned to appear, was therefore properly overruled. These facts were the indispensable conditions of a due adjudication by the foreign court, and whatever is necessarily implied is sufficiently pleaded. Nor was it cause of demurrer that the complaint did not state that any hearing or trial was had. The averment as to a due adjudication implied that there was a fair opportunity for a hearing, and the defendant could not complain that he did not avail himself of it.

Three special defenses were pleaded, and, on demurrer, held insufficient. The second of these set up that the defendant was served with the process in the English action while transiently stopping at an hotel in Birmingham, and when he was about to take his departure for home, and that such service was so made and timed for the purpose of embarrassing him and obtaining an unjust and unfair advantage, by preventing his having a fair opportunity to make his defense unless he prolonged his stay abroad indefinitely. The rights of sovereignty extend to all persons and things, not excepted by some special privilege, that are within the territory of the sovereign. An alien friend, however transient his presence may be, is entitled to a temporary protection, and owes in return a temporary allegiance. Story, Confl. L. §§ 18, 22, 541; Carlisle v. United States 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 147, 154, 21 L. ed 426, 429. The fact that the defendant was a foreigner, making but a brief stay in the country, and on the point of leaving it for his own, did not deprive the courts of England of all jurisdiction over him. The Roman maxim, Actor sequitur forum rei, if it has any force in English or American jurisprudence, operates as a permission, rather than a command. A man who is absent from his domicil can still be sued there, but he can also be sued wherever he is found, if personally served with legal process within the jurisdiction where the plaintiff seeks his remedy. The action must be brought, indeed, in a court to which the defendant is subject, and subject at the time of suit; but, unless protected by treaty stipulation or official privilege, he is subject to every court within reach of whose process he may enter. The Roman law allowed a nonresident to be sued where he had established a temporary seat of business, and, in some cases, where he had simply contracted a single obligation. Dig. V., 1, De judiciis, et ubi quisque agere vel conveniri debeat, 2, 19, 24. The common law, so far as concerns the enforcement of a pecuniary liability, goes further, and operates alike upon every private individual who may be found, however transiently within the territory where it is in force. Whart. Confl. L. § 653. An English court will take cognizance of an action on a contract, wherever made, and between whatever parties. Holland, Jur. 5th ed. 349. So the courts of this state have always regarded transitory actions as following the person, and entertained them against foreigners found within our jurisdiction, whether brought by a foreigner or a citizen. Place v. Lyon, Kirby (Conn.) 404–406; Potter v. Allin, 2 Root, 63. 66, 67. "Territorial jurisdiction attaches (with special exceptions) upon all persons either permanently or temporarily resident within the territory while they are within it; but it does not follow them after they have withdrawn from it, and when they are living in another independent country." Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote [1894] A. C. 670, 683. The several states of the United States are, as respects their relations to each other, excepting only such of these as are regulated by the Costitution of the United States, independent and foreign sovereignties. Buckner v. Finley, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 586, 590, 7 L. ed. 528, 530; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 722, 24 L. ed. 565, 568. The effect in one of them of a suit brought or judgment rendered in another is precisely the same as if the latter were a foreign country, except so far as art. 4, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States may have established a different rule. Hatch v. Spofford, 22 Conn. 485, 498, 58 Am. Dec. 433; M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 312, 324, 10 L. ed. 177, 183; Thompson v. Whitman, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 457, 461, 21 L. ed. 897, 899. Notwithstanding that provision of the Constitution, and the statute passed to enforce it (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 905), the jurisdiction of a state court whose judgment is brought in question in another state is always open to inquiry. In that respect, every state court is to be regarded as a foreign court. Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 165, 23 L. ed. 271, 273; Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 294, 298, 34 L. ed. 670, 671, 673.

The courts of this state have never before had occasion to pass directly upon the defenses which may be open here to an action upon a judgment of a court of a foreign country, but they have often been called to consider the effect of legal proceedings instituted in one of the United States against a citizen of another; and the right to secure jurisdiction over a nonresident, who is served with process while transiently in the state, has been uniformly upheld. Hart v. Granger, 1 Conn. 154. 165, 173; Wood v. Watkinson, 17 Conn. 500, 504, 44 Am. Dec. 562; Hatch v. Spofford, supra; Bishop v. Vose, 27 Conn. 1, 11, 12; Duryee v. Hale, 31 Conn. 217, 223; Easterly v. Goodwin, 35 Conn. 273, 278; O'Sullivan v. Overton, 56 Conn. 102, 103. These decisions are based on what has been deemed an accepted principle of international law, applicable between the states, on no other ground than that they are, as to such a question, in the position of foreign nations to each other. Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, supra; Lazier v. Westcott, 26 N. Y. 146, 154, 82 Am. Dec. 404.

The English court having, then, jurisdiction of the parties, and presumably of the action and the subject-matter, as to which no question has been made, there is nothing in the defense now pleaded that the suit was brought, as it was and when it was, "for the purpose of embarrassing and impeding the defendant, and to prevent his having a fair opportunity to defend said suit unless he prolonged his stay indefinitely at said Birmingham, and thereby said plaintiff sought to obtain an unjust and unfair advantage over said defendant." Where there is a legal right to do a certain act, the motive which induces the exercise of the right is of no importance. McCune v. Norwich City Gas Co. 30 Conn. 521, 524, 79 Am. Dec. 278; Occum Co. v. A. & W. Sprague Mfg. Co. 34 Conn. 529, 540. Nullus videtur dolo facere, qui suo jure utitur. The act complained of having been fully stated, and being one which the law permitted, whatever advantage it gave the plaintiffs could be neither unjust nor unfair; and these epithets are therefore of no effect. Middletown v. Boston & N. Y. Air Line R. Co. 53 Conn. 351, 359. They had the right to sue the defendant where they found him, or at his domicil in Connecticut, and, in the choice of the forum, were free to consult their own convenience, without regard to any loss he might sustain from "the law's delays." Lovell v. Hammond Co. 66 Conn. 500, 512.

The demurrer to the second defense also admitted that the defendant, when served with the process of the foreign court, was president of the National Wire Mattress Company, a Connecticut corporation, and "was in no wise indebted to the plaintiffs in said suit, all of which was well known to said plaintiffs, but any claim that they had, or may have had, in which the defendant was in any way interested was a claim against said National Wire-Mattress Company, all of which was well known to said plaintiffs." By this, and by the third defense, is raised the question as to how far a foreign judgment for a sum of money, rendered against one of our citizens by a competent tribunal, acting within its jurisdiction, should be held conclusive in a suit brought here for its collection. It is the settled rule in England, that in an action instituted there on a foreign judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, the proceedings before which were not so conducted as to be clearly contrary to natural justice, the defendant cannot be allowed to go into the merits of the original cause of action, which were tried in the foreign court, unless it be necessary in order to support a claim that the judgment was procured by fraud. In such case the merits may be retried, not to show that the foreign court came to a wrong conclusion, but that it was fraudulently misled into coming to a wrong conclusion. If the triors are convinced that the foreign judgment should have been rendered, on the merits, the other way, but still do not find that there was fraud, the defense fails. Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 295, 302; Vadala v. Lawes, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 310, 316, 319. Judge Story in his work on the Conflict of Laws, concludes a discussion of this subject, which is referred to in terms of commendation by this court in Hatch v. Spofford, 22 Conn. 501, 58 Am. Dec. 433, with the remark that the principle of reciprocity may not improperly be applied, and foreign judgments treated as conclusive in any country, if rendered in another where like effect is conceded to judgments of the courts of the former. "This," he observes, "is certainly a very reasonable rule, and may, perhaps, hereafter work itself firmly into the structure of international jurisprudence." Story, Confl. L. § 618.

What is termed the "comity of nations" is the formal expression and ultimate result of that mutual respect accorded throughout the civilized world by the representatives of each sovereign power to those of every other, in considering the effects of their official acts. Its source is a sentiment of reciprocal regard, founded on identity of position and similarity of institutions. The effect to be given to a foreign judgment in personam, for a money demand, must be determined either by the comity of nations, the rule of absolute reciprocity, or the personal obligation resting upon the defendant. Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 40 L. ed. 95. Whichever test may be adopted, the result would be the same where the question arises between the courts of England and those of an American state which was once an English colony. They are engaged in administering the same system of jurisprudence, and are bound together by common institutions and modes of thought, no less than by sharing the same language and the same history. The close and extensive commercial intercourse, also, between the United States and England, and across the long Canadian frontier, makes it especially important that the many controversies to which it must give rise should be promptly brought to a final settlement. When an American voluntarily places himself on English soil, he comes under a local and temporary allegiance to its sovereign, which makes it his duty to respect any summons with which he may there be served, to appear before the courts of the country. The process served upon the defendant gave him full notice of the character and items of the plaintiffs' claim. He was bound either to enter an appearance, or submit to the consequences of a default. He put himself under the power of the court, the moment he entered the territory which was subject to its authority. Nor did he put himself under its power simply in the sense that it could issue process and render judgment against him, which would be of force within the limits of that territory. To that extent its judgments might be valid, though rendered without any personal service, upon a simple attachment of goods, or by publication. But they would be mere expressions of the will of the sovereign, and impose no personal obligation which other sovereigns could recognize or enforce. Bischoff v. Wethered, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 812, 19 L. ed. 829. Judgments rendered against a foreigner who is personally served, when personally present, stand on a ground wholly different. These, and these only, so far as actions for money damages are concerned, are entitled to full respect in the courts of other countries, by the principles of international law. As between the United States and Great Britain, it may be fairly assumed that every citizen of either, while within the territory of the other, assents to the jurisdiction of its courts of justice over all pecuniary controversies to which he may be duly made a party before them. This doctrine that presence confers jurisdiction may not be one recognized in Roman law, or the modern civil law. Dig. XLII., 1. De re judicata, etc., 53; Story, Confl. L. §§ 611–617; Wharton Confl. L. § 653; Mourlon's Répétitions Ecrites sur le Code Civil, tom. III., § 1469.

The Romans viewed law as personal rather than territorial, in its operation. The traveler carried with him the shield of his own law; and on the same territory there might be, even for its permanent inhabitants, two systems of jurisprudence of equal force, each governing a different race. Such principles of government find no place in the common law of England and of Connecticut. With us the law of the land protects all who stand upon it, and whenever a right has been violated, gives a remedy, without regard to the nationality of the offender.

In our opinion, the queen's bench division of the high court of justice had full jurisdiction to decide the original controversy between the parties to this action. The defendant accepted the forum when he voluntarily placed himself on English soil, and so came under an implied obligation to respect such legal process as might be served upon him there, to the extent of satisfying any resulting judgment duly rendered for a pecuniary demand. The law raises this obligation because the interests of human society require it, and it is not escaped by departing from one country into another, except so far as a judicial sanction may be withheld because reciprocity is refused. The maxim, Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium, is not restricted in its application to controversies or suits originating in the state before whose courts it is invoked. It does not rest on the excellence of any particular system of jurisprudence. It governs wherever the parties come, in the last resort, before a court constituted under an orderly establishment of legal procedure. No one who has been, or could have been, heard upon a disputed claim, in a cause to which he was duly made a party, pending before a competent judicial tribunal, having jurisdiction over him, proceeding in due course of justice, and not misled by the fraud of the other party, should be allowed, after a final judgment has been pronounced, to renew the contest in another country. The object of courts is hardly less to put an end to controversies than to decide them justly.

The defenses in question do not, in terms, charge the plaintiffs with fraud. The averments that they well knew when they brought their suit that the defendant was in no wise indebted to them, and that the only claim they had, or might have, in which he was in any way interested, was one against the corporation of which he was an officer, do not, standing alone, import that they attempted to impose, and did impose, upon the court. Fraud is never presumed. The claim against the corporation may have been such that the defendant could be held collaterally liable upon it, although it remained the debt of the corporation only. It may have been contracted by him in behalf of the corporation, but without its authority. It may have arisen from a transaction that was ultra vires, but which he had falsely represented to be within its powers. If he was in no way liable to the plaintiffs, the place to show it was in the English court. A state of facts quite similar to that here alleged was set up, and established by proof, in one of the leading cases in our Reports. A citizen and resident of Connecticut, while transiently in New York, was served with process from one of her courts, in an action based upon a contract made by the plaintiff with a Connecticut corporation, but which, in his declaration, he had, as the defendant asserted, "falsely assumed" to have been made by the latter personally, and on his own personal credit. The defendant entered no appearance, and judgment by default was rendered against him for the sum demanded, to collect which suit was instituted against him here. He thereupon brought a bill in equity for an injunction, and, in addition to what has been already stated, alleged and proved that the plaintiff's attorney assured him, after the service of the process, that a mistake had been made in suing him individually, instead of the corporation, and thereupon agreed that nothing further should be done in relation to the action without previous notice to him, in consequence of which assurance he had omitted to enter an appearance. The injunction was granted on this last ground, but that founded on the false averments in the declaration in the New York suit was rejected as untenable, in these words: "A suit was commenced in New York against the present plaintiff, by virtue of which, and of the process thereon, he was arrested, and such proceedings were had that a judgment for about $600 was obtained against him, on a cause of action founded wholly on a contract, with which, personally, he had nothing to do; but which was entered into by him, as the agent of the Norwich Foundry Company, a corporation with which the plaintiff in that suit had had previous dealings, and was well known to him, at the time, as the party with whom he was contracting. If this was all, the plaintiff would have no remedy, however unjust it might be, to compel him to pay that judgment. Still, as he was duly served with process in that suit, it was his duty to make defense in it; and an injunction ought not to be granted to relieve him from the consequences of his own neglect." Pearce v. Olney, 20 Conn. 544, 555; Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3, 12, 13, 27 L. ed. 346, 349, 350. The doctrine of Pearce v. Olney is not less applicable to the case at bar because the judgment in question there was one of a sister state, while here it emanates from the court of a foreign country. It is true that fraud in procuring it is no defense at law to an action on a judgment of the former description. Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475. It is, however, an equitable bar to its enforcement, just as it is in case of a domestic judgment. A judgment may be good at law, and yet equity may deem it against conscience for the plaintiff to stand upon his legal rights. In such a case it is because the judgment is good at law that equitable relief is granted. In Pearce v. Olney these principles governed the decision. An injunction was granted on account of a fraud as to a matter which could not have been put in issue in the New York suit. An injunction was refused on account of a fraud as to a matter which could have been put in issue in the New York suit. In the case at bar, by the force of the practice act, equitable defenses could be pleaded by way of answer; but the defendant had no equity, because the question of his indebtedness to the plaintiffs, if it was to be contested, should have been put in issue before the English court. Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 735, 4 Eng. L. & Eq. 252. Nor did the case of Pearce v. Olney rest on any special duty of a citizen of one of the United States, as such, to submit himself to the jurisdiction of a court of another state before which he may be duly summoned. The conclusiveness of a judgment rendered in one state, when relied on in another, is in no manner dependent on the citizenship of the parties to it. It has equal weight whether they are Americans or foreigners. The Constitution of the United States secures to the citizens of each of them certain privileges and immunities as respects every other state, but it imposes upon them no particular duties in return. It places the citizen of one state, who enters the territory of another, no more under the power of its courts than if he were an alien visitor. See Bonaparte v. Baltimore City Appeal Tax Ct. 104 U. S. 592, 595, 26 L. ed. 845, 846. It follows that the judgment in suit was conclusive as to the merits of the cause of action, and that the several special defenses, so far as they sought a retrial of them, were properly overruled. The defendant had already had his day in court.

The present action was brought by two individuals, described as partners doing business under the firm name of Fisher, Brown, & Co.; and the English judgment was alleged in the complaint to have been recovered by "the plaintiffs" on April 3, 1889. Upon the trial of the issue closed upon the first defense, they offered in evidence a copy of the record in the English suit, in which the plaintiffs were named throughout simply as Fisher, Brown, & Co. They also offered at the same time certain depositions tending to prove that the plaintiffs constituted, during the whole of the year 1889, the copartnership of Fisher, Brown, & Co., and as such recovered the judgment in question, and that, by the laws and rules of court in England, any persons claiming as copartners could sue in the name of the firm of which they were members at the time of the accruing of the cause of action. The defendant objected to all this evidence on the ground that the record offered varied from that alleged, and did not show whether Fisher, Brown, & Co. was a corporation or copartnership, or, if a copartnership, that the plaintiffs were members of it, and could not be helped out by parol, and also claimed that the depositions did not show that the plaintiffs were members of such a firm when the original cause of action arose. The court committed no error in overruling these objections and claims, and admitting the evidence. The law and practice determining the form of judicial proceedings in a foreign court may always be shown, and shown by parol. The testimony that the plaintiffs were the members of a firm styled Fisher, Brown, & Co. throughout 1889, and as such recovered the judgment in suit, gave an intelligible meaning to the words "Fisher, Brown, & Co.," as used in the record of the high court of justice, and, in connection with it, tended to show that they were also copartners when the cause of action accrued; for else they could not have been entitled to such a judgment, under the rules governing suits by copartners in the copartnership name. Wherever a judgment on a partnership demand can lawfully be given in favor of the copartnership, without stating the names of the copartners, it is, in effect, a judgment in favor of such copartners, described by their copartnership name, and may properly be declared on as such in any proceedings subsequently brought to enforce it. This is merely describing it according to its legal effect. The defendant admitted that he was the person against whom the English judgment was rendered, but put the plaintiffs on proof that they were the parties by whom it was recovered. Extrinsic evidence of this was therefore required, and the depositions were clearly admissible to identify particular individuals as those to whom the description of the judgment creditors in the record, by a partnership name, properly applied.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

Andrews, Ch. J., and Torrance and Fenn, JJ., concurred.

Hamersley, J., dissenting:

The action on a foreign judgment is an action at common law, sanctioning an obligation legal by force of the common law. Our law on this subject depends on the common law of England as it stood at the date of our independence. The authority which lies at the foundation of that law is Sinclair v. Fraser, 20 How. St. Tr. 468, 469, decided by the House of Lords in 1771. The judgment creditor sued his debtor in Scotland. The court of sessions refused to give any effect to the foreign judgment, and held the party bound to prove the nature and extent of his demand. The House of Lords, upon appeal, reversed this decision, upon the ground, as stated in the order of reversal, "that the judgment of the court of Jamaica ought to be received as evidence prima facie of the debt, and that it lies on the defendant to impeach the justice of it, or to show that it was irregularly and unduly obtained." In Walker v. Witter, 1 Dougl. 1, decided in 1778, it was held that an action of debt would lie for the collection of a foreign judgment, because indebitatus assumpsit would lie, but in a declaration in debt the plea of nul tiel record was bad, because the action was not on a specialty, but for recovery of a simple-contract debt; and Lord Mansfield said that the doctrine of Sinclair v. Fraser was unquestionable. "Foreign judgments are a ground of action everywhere, but they are examinable." And Ashurst, J., indicates the ground of the right when he says, "In indebitatus assumpsit on a foreign judgment, the judgment is shown as a consideration." In Galbraith v. Neville, 1 Dougl. 6, note, decided about 1781, there was apparently an attempt to set up a defense on the ground that the foreign judgment offered in evidence was wrongly decided on the merits; and Buller, J., expressed an opinion based on his understanding of a reported saying of Lord Hardwicke, that the foreign judgment was not conclusive upon the merits of the questions actually adjudicated while Lord Kenyon took a different view; but the case was decided in favor of the judgment, as all the judges were of opinion that no evidence had been adduced to impeach it. In Philips v. Hunter (1795) 2 H. Bl. 402, 410, a dictum of Eyre, Ch. J., supports the suggestion of Ashurst, J., in Walker v. Witter, and asserts that as a ground of action a foreign judgment is treated, "not as conclusive, but as matter in pais, as consideration prima facie sufficient to raise a promise; we examine it, as we do all other considerations of promises, and for that purpose we receive evidence of what the law of the foreign state is, and whether the judgment is warranted by that law. In all other cases, we give entire faith and credit to the sentences of foreign courts, and consider them as conclusive." And the suggestion of Ashurst, J., is further supported by Best, Ch. J., in Arnott v. Redfern (1826) 3 Bing. 353, 357. He says: "It has been decided by the highest authority, in the case of Sinclair v. Fraser that 'foreign judgments are prima facie evidence of a debt, although it is competent to the defendant to impeach the justice of them, or to show that they are irregularly or unduly obtained.' This is founded on a plain and obvious principle of natural justice." The common law as established by Sinclair v. Fraser and Walker v. Witter, is the law adopted by this state. 1 Swift, Dig. 573; Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn. 380, 382, 10 Am. Dec. 151. The same law has generally been adopted by other states as their common law. Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88; Taylor v. Phelps, 1 Harr. & G. 492; Mills v. Duryee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411; Burnham v. Webster, 1 Woodb. & M. 172, Fed. Cas. No. 2,179; Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 290, 304, 18 L. ed. 475, 479. This law declares that, when a judgment is rendered by a foreign court, that fact may be the source of a legal obligation between the parties to such judgment, which can be enforced in our courts through the ancient form of an action on the case. But beyond this the law is not clear. The nature and ground of such obligation are not defined. The defenses to such action are not settled. In respect to these matters, in this state, and generally with American courts, the field is an open one,—not to make law by arbitrarily recognizing or rejecting a defense, but to declare the law resulting from established principles.

In the present case the second defense alleges, sufficiently for the purpose of this decision, that the judgment was rendered by a court of Great Britain upon default of appearance; that the defendant is a citizen of the United States, never a subject of the queen nor resident within her dominions; that he was served with the notice to appear while casually in England, and on the eve of departure; that he was absent from the Kingdom at the time he was required to appear, and during all subsequent proceedings; that the cause of action on which the notice to appear in court was based did not arise in England, and did not concern any conduct, act, or contract of the defendant done or entered into within the dominions of the Queen. This defense was held insufficient by the trial court, and my associates reach the conclusion that such facts do not constitute a good defense to the action. I must dissent from that conclusion. I believe it cannot be supported, except on the theory that our courts have at common law the power to authorize the execution of the will of a foreign sovereign, signified in a judgment, and to set the conditions on which such execution will be granted. I believe such theory to be inconsistent with established principles of common law; that the power of authorizing such execution of the will of a foreign sovereign belongs, not to the judicial, but to the executive or legislative, department; and that it would be against public policy to exercise the power, under such conditions as exist in this case, even if it were vested in the court. A defense cannot be intelligently passed upon unless the nature of the obligation it is claimed to negative is clearly defined. What is this common-law obligation, whose violation was originally enforced by the common-law action on the case? It clearly does not arise from a tort, nor does it arise from a contract. Although a judgment is sometimes spoken of as in the nature of a contract, such language must be confined to certain analogies not affecting the essential character of a judgment. Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 572; Todd v. Crumb, 5 McLean, 172, Fed. Cas. No. 14,073; Wyman v. Mitchell, 1 Cow. 316, 320; Kramer v. Rebman, 9 Iowa, 114, 117. When the clause in the Federal Constitution prohibiting states from passing any law impairing the obligation of a contract was appealed to as protecting judgments, the appeal was denied by the United States Supreme Court on the ground that a judgment is in no sense a contract or agreement between the parties, even when founded upon a contract: citing Lord Mansfield in Bidleson v. Whytel, 3 Burr. 1545: "A judgment is no contract, nor can be considered in the light of a contract; for judicium redditur in invitum." Morley v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 146 U. S. 162, 169, 36 L. ed. 925, 929. An obligation which is neither ex contractu nor ex delicto must spring from the relation of the parties to some event, under such circumstances that a legal duty arises. Our common-law obligation, therefore, belongs to those miscellaneous obligations arising from facts which are not conventions, nor yet wrongs, but nevertheless are causes of obligations, which, for want of a better name, are classed as "quasi contracts." The principal fact from which the obligation arises is a rendition of final judgment by a foreign municipal court; and the main difficulty in defining that obligation is found in the particular character of a judgment, which is not only a fact that may, in connection with other facts, raise an obligation between the parties, transitory in its nature and so cognizable in our courts, but is also an act of the foreign sovereign, imposing an obligation of obedience, which, as such, can only be put in execution within the territory subject to that sovereign. This double aspect of a judgment is distinctly recognized and established in our common law, although it has been obscured by using in some cases the form of an action to put in execution a domestic judgment. So our first step towards ascertaining the nature of the common-law obligation which may arise between the parties to a foreign judgment is to make clear this distinction established by our law between that obligation, and the obligation of obedience imposed by a domestic judgment, and sometimes enforced through the form of an action.

The final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction puts an end to all further litigation between the parties in respect to the specific cause of action adjudicated between them, and decided and settled by the judgment, and the original obligation which the action was brought to enforce no longer exists. Gaius notes the application of such rule in the early Roman law. Tollitur adhuc obli- gatio litis contestatione, si modo legitimo judicio fuerit actum. Gai. III., § 180. See also Id. § 181. And Austin demonstrates that the extinction of the original cause of action by the rendition of final judgment results from fundamental principles of jurisprudence. The obligation has been violated, the right of action arising from that violation has been exercised, and the sanction prescribed by law has been administered. Austin, Jur. passim. Such judgment, therefore, is a declaration of the sovereign, through his court, that a legal obligation has been violated, and is a final determination of the penalty imposed by him for that violation. This result is commonly, and perhaps somewhat inaccurately, expressed by the phrase, "The original right of action is merged in the judgment." But this act of the sovereign not only satisfies and puts an end to the original obligation; it also imposes a new obligation on the subject of the judgment, and this obligation implies a corresponding right in the person to whom the subject of the judgment is commanded to pay its amount. Such corresponding right is a right to the execution of the command by which it was created; and the remedy given by our law is the execution, or process by which the property of the delinquent may be distrained, or his person imprisoned, until the obligation is satisfied. This remedy may be granted on application, as in the case of a capias, or after notice to the delinquent, as in the case of a scire facias. A remedy is also given by means of the action of debt on judgment. As now permitted, this remedy is an anomalous proceeding. Blackstone says: "This method seems to have been invented when real actions were more in use than at present, and damages were permitted to be recovered thereon, in order to have the benefit of a writ of capias to take the defendant's body in execution for those damages, which process was allowable in an action of debt (in consequence of Stat. 25 Edw. III., chap. 17), but not in an action real. Wherefore, since the disuse of those real actions, actions of debt upon judgment in personal suits have been pretty much discountenanced by the courts, as being generally vexatious and oppressive, by harassing the defendant with the costs of two actions, instead of one." 3 Bl. Com. 159, 160. Coke says that the remedy was provided by common law, as the only method (prior to Stat. Westm. II., authorizing a writ of scire facias for that purpose) of reviving a judgment dormant by reason of the failure to sue out a writ of execution within a year and a day, and of obtaining execution thereon. Coke, Litt. § 290. Whether the remedy was originally "invented" to provide a more effective writ of execution in a peculiar action, or as a means of reviving a dormant judgment, so that execution might issue after the time fixed by law for its issue had expired, it is certain that its purpose was to provide a method of obtaining execution of the original judgment in cases where the law regulating the issue of execution was defective. The use of the action of debt on judgment, when the remedy by execution is complete, which was occasionally permitted at common law, is therefore anomalous. It was discouraged by the courts, and, by statute (44 Geo. III.), costs were not allowed on such action, unless by special order of court. The court of king's bench, taking advantage of an act reconstituting the county courts and making some cumulative provisions as to the issue of executions, held that the act, by making new provisions, restricted the remedy to the writ of execution, and that debt on the judgment of a county court would not lie. The motive of the decision is indicated in the expression of Campbell, Ch. J.: "I rejoice that we are able to come to this conclusion by the established rules of law; for there can be no doubt that it is most desirable that such actions should not lie." Berkeley v. Elderkin (1853) 1 El. & Bl. 805, 809. This decision was followed the same year by the court of exchequer. Austin v. Mills, 9 Exch. 288.

In this state the right of a judgment creditor to execution was not limited to a year and a day after the judgment was entered; and the English common law, permitting an action of debt on judgment when the remedy by capias was adequate, was not regarded as adopted in this particular. The common understanding of the profession, and the weight of authority, so far as the question had been before the courts, was stated by Judge Swift in his Digest (vol. 1, p. 573, original edition): "In this state an execution can be prayed out at any time during the life of the parties, and debt on judgment is not sustainable unless one of the parties is dead, or some new object is to be obtained." But in 1822, in the case of Denison v. Williams, 4 Conn. 402, a majority of the court held that the English common law, in this particular, must be regarded as in force here.

We find, therefore, that a domestic judgment is an exercise of the power of the state over its citizens, by which the obligation sought to be enforced in the action resulting in the judgment ceases to exist, and a new obligation to pay the amount of the judgment is imposed. This latter obligation, unlike one arising from the agreement of parties between themselves, is not transitory; the rule, "Debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci" (1 Saund. 74), does not apply. The obligation or debt created by the act of the state is enforceable by the state only within its own limits. "Judgment creates a debt all over the kingdom." Gilbert, Debt. 392. The appropriate remedy given to one holding the right corresponding to this obligation is not by action calling for judicial adjudication, but by writ of execution. This writ is granted on application, or after notice, and when such remedy is defective a peculiar action is authorized, whereby the right to execution may be made effective; and, by an anomaly in the law, this action may lie when the reasons for its use do not exist. But under all circumstances such action is, in its essential characteristics, not an adjudication between the parties, in any ordinary sense of the word, but simply a method of verifying the command of the state, signified in the judgment, and of enforcing by writ of execution that command. Williams v. Cable, 7 Conn. 119. It follows that the obligation arising from a domestic judgment enforceable in our courts differs materially from any ordinary obligation arising from the acts of the parties, whether ex contractu or quasi ex contractu; that it is imposed directly by the state, and is an obligation of obedience, not simply of the law in general, but of this particular command; and that the corresponding right is a right to the process of the state for the execution of the judgment. The fact that an action of debt may be resorted to, instead of a capias or scire facias to obtain execution of the judgment, does not affect its essential nature. "The form of procedure cannot change their [its] character." Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 514, 26 L. ed. 205. It also follows that this peculiar obligation of obedience, ex vi termini, has no existence beyond the limits of the state which imposed it. That these conclusions are settled by the common law cannot be questioned. When a foreign state has ascertained the violation of any obligation between parties, and, by judgment of its court, has put an end to the obligation whose violation is thus ascertained, and fixed its punishment, creating a new obligation to obey the command of the state by submission to that penalty, our law is settled that such an exercise of sovereign power cannot operate beyond the limits of the state where the judgment is rendered. This principle is commonly expressed by the saying: "The original cause of action is not merged in a foreign judgment." It is true, the judgment may be shown as a fact which, under our law, may be material in establishing the allegations of plaintiff or defendant (a subject which will be considered directly); but the act of the foreign sovereign in putting an end to the obligation has no force within our territory, and the original obligation remains subject to the adjudication of our courts as truly as if the judgment had not been rendered. This is in accordance with well-recognized principles of international law. "Since a judgment is merely an act of sovereign power, it can, of itself, have no extraterritorial effect. The officers of the state in which it is pronounced must carry it into execution, whether with or without the intervention of any further formalities, but it can convey no authority, to the officers of another state." Westlake Private International Law, *361; Story, Confl. Laws, 278. And is thoroughly established as our municipal law. Bigelow, Estoppel, 246; Smith v. Nicolls, 7 Scott, 147; Hall v. Odber, 11 East, 118, 124; Wood v. Gamble, 11 Cush. 8, 59 Am Dec. 135; Bank of Australasia v. Harding, 19 L. J. C. P. 345, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. *702. And the law is so clear that the action to recover the amount of a foreign judgment is an action concurrent with that on the original cause of action, that the forms given in Chitty's Pleading, for an action on the judgment, all contain the instruction, "add counts for the original debt;" and the practice of trying the right in the original cause of action, as well as the right to the amount of the judgment in the same proceeding, has always prevailed, and continues under the new method of procedure in England, so that a verdict may be given on both issues. And herein is found the radical distinction between the obligation of obedience imposed by a domestic judgment (and by a foreign judgment within the territory of the foreign sovereign) and the common-law obligation which may arise between the parties to a foreign judgment. The latter cannot involve the right to the execution of the judgment. It must be consistent with the continued existence of the original cause of action. It cannot depend on the mere rendition of the judgment, but requires certain relations of the parties to the fact of the judgment, which may not exist in respect to every such judgment.

Our next step in ascertaining the nature of this common law obligation is to fully recognize the established principle that such obligation must depend upon the municipal law, and cannot result from any rule of international law, nor yet from the application of any so-called rule of "comity." It is unnecessary to repeat or extend the argument which demonstrates that by international law a judgment has no force beyond the territory of the state where it is rendered It cannot be executed in a foreign state unless by authority of that state. No rule of international law requires the exercise of such authority. In fact it has been exercised absolutely by no nation. It is rarely exercised at all, except by force of an express treaty, or the implied treaty of reciprocity, and then only upon conditions fixed by the laws of the nation where execution is sought. There being no international law in respect to the execution of foreign judgments, it is certain that the common law obligation arising from the relation of parties to the fact of such judgment cannot be the result of any rule of international law. I believe, indeed there is no nation, unless possibly Denmark, whose municipal law recognizes (as our common law does) as legal and enforceable by action in its courts any obligation arising between the parties to pay the amount of a foreign judgment. Such obligation—as distinguished from the obligation of a subject to obey the specific command of his sovereign—is peculiar to the English common law, and depends wholly upon our municipal law.

It is equally clear that such obligation cannot result from any rule of comity of nations, so called. Such "comity" implies a general practice of all nations. There is no such general practice. On the contrary, the action of other nations in respect to foreign judgments indicates that there is not even a generally prevailing opinion which it would be practicable to make the basis of any rule of comity. In examining the law of other countries we should keep in mind the tendency to overlook the essential distinctions, clearly indicated in our own law, between a foreign judgment as a ground for asking the issue of process to put the judgment in execution,—as a ground for the application of the law of estoppel on the principle of res judicata,—and as a ground for a civil action between the parties to the judgment. In England, if recent cases can be treated as not altering the common law which once prevailed there, the law in respect to foreign judgments is the same as our own; but among the dependent states of England marked differences exist. Among other nations there is an almost uniform rejection of any right in a foreign judgment creditor as against the judgment debtor to enforce any obligations arising from their relations to such judgment. There is an almost equally uniform rejection of any right to demand of the government process by which a foreign judgment shall be put in execution. Where such execution is granted at all, it is granted on conditions that are governed by no common principle. The nearest approach to a common principle is found in the general refusal to grant any execution, unless in pursuance of an express treaty, or the implied treaty of recognized reciprocity of action. Sweden and Norway refuse any recognition of foreign judgments. Russia also refuses, unless bound by a treaty. Germany refuses except in cases where reciprocity is guaranteed. The law of Austria is similar. France and Belgium practically refuse, for consent is given only after inquiry into the merits of the judgment. A similar rule prevails in Portugal and Spain. The refusal to execute any judgment on default against one of its own subjects is general. Besides the different rules of conduct established by special treaties, the various conditions upon which execution of a foreign judgment may be granted, include the following: That the judgment is satisfactory in the discretion of the executive; that it is satisfactory in the discretion of the court; that it is rendered in a country which guarantees reciprocity; that it meets various conditions specified by the local law; that it is not rendered on default; that it is shown to be just upon examination of its merits. The only government which unqualifiedly treats a foreign judgment (excluding, however, one which has been rendered on default of appearance) as a domestic one is the republic of Liberia. See collation of laws in Piggott on Judgments, 357 et seq. It is evident that such action furnishes no ground for claiming an existing "comity of nations." It rather indicates that the wished for uniformity of action must be secured through international treaties. The only countries where the duties arising between the parties to a foreign judgment can be enforced by civil action are those where the common law is administered, and it may well be doubted if a more desirable and practicable basis for an international agreement on this subject can be found than is furnished by the analogies of that common law. It was in view of this condition of the usage of nations that Lord Blackburn, in Godard v. Gray, L. R. 6 Q. B. 139, 148, stated so emphatically: "It is not an admitted principle of the law of nations that a state is bound to enforce within its territories the judgment of a foreign tribunal;" and in Schibsby v. Westenholz repudiated the suggestion that the principle on which foreign judgments were enforced was that which is loosely called "comity."

Closely connected with what has been said in respect to the office of a judgment is the specious claim that the voluntary presence of a person within the territory of a state implies an obligation to respect such legal process as may be served on him there, to the extent of satisfying any valid resulting judgment; and that such obligation is the one recognized by our common law as enforceable by a civil action in our courts. Such "implied obligation" is admittedly one due from a person to the state; i. e. to respect the process of the state,—to obey the mandate of its judgment. To call such an obligation "implied" is but another form of expressing the old fancy of the social compact,—that all laws are binding by reason of an implied obligation. This fancy cannot affect the fact that the lawfully expressed will of the sovereign directly imposes a legal obligation on the subject and on all within his lawful power. This is an obligation of obedience resulting from positive law. Within the limit of the sovereign's power over an alien, the obligation due from such alien is the same as that due from a native subject. So, whatever obligation is due from the alien to respect the process and obey the judgment of the sovereign in whose territory he may be, is not implied (unless for the purposes of speculation) but is directly imposed by positive law, binding within, but not without, the territory of that sovereign. Such an obligation cannot be the one enforced by our common-law action, because our law distinctly pronounces it invalid. If the obligation is valid, the judgment must be valid throughout. If it binds one party to obedience to the mandate of payment for injury done, it must bind the other to obedience to the mandate of extinction of the original cause of action. Our common law says the original cause of action is not extinguished and the obligation of obedience cannot be enforced in our courts. By this process of exclusion we are enabled to mark the limits of the obligation legal by our law, enforceable in our courts, which arises from the relation of the parties to the fact of a foreign judgment, so that its real nature can be ascertained with adequate accuracy. It is not the obligation of obedience imposed by the command or sovereign act signified in the mere rendition of the judgment. Still less is it the "implied obligation" which the votaries of the social compact fancy to be the origin of all law. It is not imposed by any rule of international law, nor by any existing "comity of nations." All such grounds of obligation are excluded by the settled principles of common law.

The only remaining ground of obligation must be found in the principle, well established and of constant application in our law, that when the relations of the parties to a fact or facts are such that the ties of natural justice require the performance of certain acts, such duty may be a legal obligation, enforceable in our courts by an appropriate action. This principle is far from countenancing the claim that a mere moral duty must be a legal obligation. To come within the operation of the principle, the duty must be such as our law has recognized as legal, or at least be clearly and strictly analogous to recognized legal duties. Our common law, in respect to the principle of res judicata and its application, distinctly recognizes as legal a duty resulting from the ties of natural justice, to accept as true, in future proceedings, the facts established in a judicial contention when the parties have participated in such contention, and submitted the controverted facts to such adjudication. In speaking of the principle of res judicata, I do not mean the fiat of the state which compels obedience to a final judgment, and forbids the parties to again contest the cause of action extinguished by that judgment (although such meaning is properly expressed in the broad use of the term), but I confine the term to its expression of the principle by which the parties are bound in other proceedings by the facts once submitted by them to a final adjudication.

In examining the relation of this principle of res judicata to a foreign judgment, we must remember that there is a vital distinction between a foreign judgment in rem and the ordinary foreign municipal judgment in personam. It is true that to a certain extent the principle of res judicata applies in the same manner to both, but there is a principle which controls judgments in rem that has no application to municipal judgments. This principle most clearly appears in the case of courts of admiralty administering justice in accordance with international law. The principle is that certain courts, by the law of nations, exercise a jurisdiction co-ordinate with that of other like courts throughout the world, and that their judgments in determining the status of certain things and persons are adjudications to which all the world are parties, and have in every nation a binding force equivalent to the judgments of the courts of that nation. As early as 1674 this principle was outlined in Hughes v. Cornelius, 2 Show. *232, and was developed in the judgment announced by Lord Mansfield in Bernardi v. Motteux, 2 Dougl. 575. In Roach v. Garvan, 1 Ves. Sr. 157, Lord Hardwicke declares that the principle results "from the law of nations in such cases; otherwise the rights of mankind would be very precarious and uncertain." This principle has been affirmed by our Federal courts. In Croudson v. Leonard, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 434, 2 L. ed. 670, Justice Johnson rests the principle, in the case of a court of admiralty, on considerations of necessity and the impropriety of revising the decisions of the maritime courts of other nations whose jurisdictions are co-ordinate throughout the world; and in The Mary, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 126, 3 L. ed. 678, Chief Justice Marshall states that these reasons given by Justice Johnson must be taken as the unanimous opinion of the court. The principle was recognized in Stewart v. Warner, 1 Day, 142, 2 Am. Dec. 61, and was fully sanctioned by an unanimous judgment of this court in 1810. Chief Justice Swift, in delivering the opinion, based the conclusion distinctly on "our acknowledgment of the law of nations." Brown v. Union Ins. Co. 4 Day, 179, 186. The law of nations was adopted by the legislature as a rule of adjudications in our courts of admiralty in 1776. 15 Col. Rec. 281. The same principle extends, with some modifications, to courts exercising a peculiar jurisdiction in respect to the status of marriage and of universal succession. Roach v. Garvan, 1 Ves. Sr 157; Tompkins v. Tompkins, 1 Story, 547, 553, Fed. Cas. No. 14,091; Holcomb v. Phelps, 16 Conn. 127.

While judgments of this class have a legal effect in all nations which recognize international law as a part of their municipal law, judgments in personam of municipal courts have no extraterritorial effect by virtue of international law; so that language used in discussing one class of judgments may produce confusion if applied unqualifiedly to the other. The principle of res judicata found its earliest application in a technical effect given to the document called a "record," containing a portion of the proceedings of a superior common law court. This technical rule was, in its inception, applied only to records of those courts whose proceedings were kept in this peculiar manner. It did not extend to inferior courts, nor to the high court of chancery. A similar technical rule applied, as between the parties to the recitals of a deed. The "record" and the deed, as between the parties, was treated as importing an absolute verity which could not be attacked collaterally. Every one was estopped from making such attack. And so the principle of res judicata has been treated as belonging to the law of estoppel, and shared in early days the odium pertaining to a technical rule which closed the gates of justice to the entrance of truth. But this technical rule, although still recognized, is not the ground on which the principle of res judicata rests. Its real foundation must be sought in principles which pervade all jurisprudence; in the considerations of public policy, which recognize that the adjudications of courts cannot serve their legitimate purpose unless final; in the universal law of equity and justice, which forbids parties who have once submitted their differences to the final decision of a court of competent jurisdiction to question a result induced by their own act; and so the protection of res judicata does not depend upon the mere contents of court documents kept in a particular manner, but also in some cases, upon the question whether the matter in dispute has in fact been submitted by the parties to a court; has in fact been heard, determined, and finally decided by that court. The estoppel involved in the establishment of such facts is more than the old technical estoppel of record; it rests on matter in pais, and partakes of the nature of an equitable estoppel. Supples v. Cannon, 44 Conn. 424, 429; Sargent v. New Haven S. B. Co. 65 Conn. 116, 126. It is evident that while an estoppel dependent on the particular form of a document peculiar to certain courts must of necessity be confined to the judgment of those courts, the estoppel involved in the principle of res judicata must of necessity apply to the judgments of all courts exercising a competent and final jurisdiction. The principle, broadly stated, is this: A claim once submitted by the parties to a court of competent jurisdiction, fully heard, determined, and decided by that court, shall not thereafter be controverted between the same parties. This principle is entirely distinct from the right, given by law to a party to a judgment, to ask the state to exercise its sovereign power in compelling obedience to that judgment. It is simply a principle of jurisprudence firmly established in our municipal law, and based on considerations so general in their application, so clearly equitable and essential in any administration of justice, that it may fairly be called a universal principle of jurisprudence. The principle does not, and from its very nature cannot, depend upon the particular court whose judicial action has been invoked, so long as its jurisdiction is competent, and its judgment final. It applies wherever the parties have so submitted their claims to a final decision by a court of competent jurisdiction, whether that court be inferior or superior, of law or of equity, domestic or foreign. The only difference between a domestic and a foreign judgment in respect to the application of this principle is a question of evidence. Can the laws of a foreign country, which prove that the foreign court was in fact a court of competent jurisdiction, and that the controverted claim was in fact submitted by the parties, heard, determined, and finally settled by the court, be admitted in accordance with the rules of evidence established by our municipal law? If the foreign laws are admitted in evidence, the fact proved by them must have like effect with a similar fact proved in the case of a domestic judgment. The admissibility of proof of foreign laws for the purpose of establishing the judicial character of a court, and the legal effect of its acts, as well as the legal effect of all acts done in a foreign country under the laws thereof, is thoroughly established as a part of our municipal law. Whether we call this law a rule of comity of nations is immaterial to the matter in hand. It is a part of our law, and derives its force from that fact; and foreign laws, as conclusive evidence of the legal effect of acts done under them, are received by virtue of our law, but with the vital qualification stated by Story, "unless they are repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interest." Story, Confl. Laws, § 38.

It may avoid some confusion to call attention here to the practical distinction between the admission in evidence of the acts and laws of a foreign sovereign and the recognition of the necessary effect of such acts and laws in the determination, as between parties, of the result of their agreements or conduct while within the operation of such foreign law; and the putting in execution within our territory of the command of a foreign sovereign. The former results from a principle of our municipal law deemed essential to the administration of justice. In assuming that the real obligations of the parties are controlled by the fact that they arose or were undertaken with reference to the law prevailing where their acts were done, our courts do not assume to execute a foreign law, although the obligation they enforce as legal under our own law may also find its ultimate source in the command of a foreign sovereign. They treat the foreign law as a fact essential, in connection with other facts, to ascertain what the parties really meant by what they have done; and if, in receiving and weighing such fact, they may also theoretically enforce the will of a foreign sovereign, it is only as an incident to the exercise of the judicial power vested in the courts, and does not offend the sovereignty of the state, where such law may be proved as a fact. But the execution of a foreign law, as ordinarily understood, is practically a very different thing. It cannot be authorized by the judicial department, and is an offense to our sovereignty, unless permitted by special legislation. This distinction is clearly marked in the case of a foreign judgment, which is merely an act or special command of a foreign sovereign. Its execution within our dominion is an offense to our sovereignty; is forbidden by our law. Our courts deny such execution, both by refusing to recognize any extinction of the original cause of action by the judgment, and by refusing to issue process to enforce the obligation of obedience to its command. But when obligations between the parties, other than the mere obligation of obedience, may arise from or be supported by the fact of such foreign judgment, it is admitted in evidence as a fact material to the determination of such obligations.

The principle of res judicata as stated, and its application to conditions resulting from a foreign as well as from a domestic judgment, subject to the rule of evidence as stated, is a firmly established principle of our common law. In its earliest application to foreign judgments some doubt was entertained as to its equal conclusiveness in such cases, as appears from the arguments of counsel in the Duchess of Kingston's Case [20 How. St. Tr. 355], but such doubts arose from a confusion of principle with a question of evidence, and never received judicial sanction. The principle cannot now be questioned. Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88; Taylor v. Phelps, 1 Harr. & G. 492; Konitzky v. Meyer, 49 N. Y. 571; Story, Confl. Laws, § 598; Chief Justice Eyre, in Philips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 402; Aldrich v. Kinney, 4 Conn. 380, 10 Am. Dec. 151. "It is an established rule that a foreign judgment, when used by way of defense, is as conclusive to every intent, as those of our own courts." Gould, J., in Griswold v. Pitcairn, 2 Conn. 85, 92. But the principle is based in part on the universal law of justice and equity which binds one to submit to a final decision resulting from his own acts, and should not be extended beyond the limits of its foundation. Where, in fact, both parties to the controverted claim have not been heard, and judgment has not been rendered upon a claim contested and adjudicated, but the only adjudication between the parties is a mere legal fiction, for a penalty imposed for a disobedience of process issued by the court, while such judgment may be enforced as the command of the state, binding on its citizens, this particular foundation of res judicata does not exist. The distinction between the principle of a judgment as a bar to recovery in a cause of action which has been extinguished by the judgment and this principle of res judicata is indicated in Smith v. Sherwood, 4 Conn. 276, 10 Am. Dec. 143. The former controls when the estoppel is what was formerly called "estoppel by judgment;" the latter where it was called "estoppel by verdict." The former is founded on the supremacy of a sovereign within his own territory; the latter is a universal principle of jurisprudence, and can only apply to a fact "tried and found between the parties." This distinction was affirmed in Bradford v. Bradford, 5 Conn. 127, 132. The defendant, in pursuance of notice under the general issue, offered in evidence as bar to the action a judgment by default; and the court said, "No estoppel is created by a default." (Hosmer, Ch. J., in his opinion, assumed that the judgment by default involved the same legal consequences as if there had been a verdict under the general issue, the record not disclosing the ground of the verdict, and added, "there existing no solid distinction between a title confessed and one tried and determined." This saying applies only to the effect of a judgment by default in respect to the special cause of action it determines It does not assert that a judgment by default is an adjudication between the parties, within the meaning of res judicata; an assertion which is expressly negatived by the opinion. And the saying is not strictly accurate under our practice. It was used by the English judges in respect to the old action of ejectment, at a time when judgment by default could only be rendered after the appearance of the defendant, when his neglect in open court to deny the allegations of the plaintiff was treated as a confession [Aslin v. Parkin, 2 Burr. 665]; the settled principle of our law being that a common-law court has no jurisdiction for the purpose of adjudication until both parties appear in court and submit to the jurisdiction. In the modern practice of judgment by default this principle is evaded through a legal fiction. 1 Reeve, Eng. Law, 452. 3 Bl. Com. 279.) "A judgment by default determines nothing except the plaintiff's right to recover in that action." Lord v. Litchfield, 36 Conn. 116, 131, 4 Am. Rep. 41. In Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 356, 24 L. ed. 195, 199, Waite, Ch. J., in illustrating the principle that an est ppel by judgment in a former action on a different cause exists only where the controverted claim was in fact litigated and adjudicated, says: "A judgment by default only admits, for the purpose of the action, the legality of the demand or claim in suit. It does not make the allegations of the declaration or complaint evidence in an action upon a different claim." In a recent case in England, where a judgment by default of appearance in a French court was set up as a bar to the claim, the court held that such a judgment did not come within the rules of res judicata which calls for a judgment on the merits, and a judgment in default of appearance is one on a matter of form only; and Sir Robert Phillimore, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The foreign judgments not having been given on the merits of the case, but on matters of form only, cannot be set up as a bar to a decision on the merits." The Delta, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 393; Frayes v. Worms, 10 C. B. N. S. 148.

As the principle of res judicata established and administered by our common law is based not only on considerations of public policy, but in part upon the obligation arising from ties of natural justice, it recognizes as legal the duty arising between parties who have contested a controverted claim before a judicial tribunal thereafter, as between themselves, in a judicial proceeding, to accept as true the facts adjudicated upon such contest. This principle may be invoked by plaintiff or defendant, to defeat or support an action. As it depends in part upon the equities arising from the relation of the parties to the fact of adjudication, and not wholly on the form of a judgment or its effect in compelling obedience to a particular command, it applies in the case of any final judgment, whether rendered by a superior or inferior court, whether foreign or domestic. This legal duty to accept as true such adjudicated facts in subsequent judicial proceedings necessarily involves the duty to pay any sum the facts so adjudicated conclusively prove to be due. The obligation is not like the one arising from the mere command of a foreign state, intraterritorial; but, as in the case of many transactions outside our territory which give rise to an obligation legal under our law, and not illegal by the law of the place, it is transitory in its nature and enforceable in our courts. Ruckmaboye v. Mottichund, 8 Moore, P. C. C. 4; Scott v. Lord Seymore, 32 L. J. Exch. 61.

The necessary result of established principles discloses the real nature of the obligation in question. It was recognized by the ancient common law, but it did not come within the few specific forms of action. It did not come within the action on the case established for the enforcement of all rights not within those specific forms, including obligations arising from the ties of natural justice. 14 Hen. VIII. chap. 31. The convenient fiction of indebitatus assumpsit was applied to this obligation on the same principle that it was applied to the obligation to pay money in the hands of the defendant; not by reason of any contract or of any delict, but under such circumstances that it equitably belonged to the plaintiff. Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burr. 1005, 1008. Controlled by this fiction, the foreign judgment stood for the consideration of the promise. Walker v. Witter, supra. It was treated as the prima facie cause of action (Phillips v. Hunter, supra; Houlditch v. Donegall, 2 Clark & F. 470); i. e. the fact of the consideration or judgment established the plaintiff's case unless the defense set up facts which impeached the consideration,—that is, such facts as proved the judgment to have been rendered under circumstances that negatived any obligation between the parties. Russell v. Smyth, 9 Mees. & W. 810; Williams v. Jones, 14 L. J. Exch. 145; Godard v. Gray, L. R. 6 Q. B. 139; Schibsby v. Westenholz, Id. 155 The fictitious character of the action first used to enforce this obligation has been the cause of confusion which has now no excuse. The fictions of the remedy removed, the essence of the obligation clearly appears. It is this: When a valid and final judgment has been rendered in respect to controverted claims tried and determined upon their merits, there arises a quasi contract obligation as between the parties to such judgment, which binds them in future proceedings to admit the facts so adjudicated to be true, and to pay over money whose ownership, as between themselves, has been established by such adjudication. This obligation exists in the case of every judgment rendered under the conditions described. It might be enforced, if there were occasion, in the case of a domestic judgment. It has not been so enforced, because the wider and more effective obligation of obedience has excluded its consideration. The remedy by execution, whether with or without the intervention of other formality, is so complete that there has been no occasion to resort to the quasi contract obligation. But in the case of a foreign judgment the obligation of obedience does not exist. No remedy by execution direct or indirect exists. The only obligation enforceable in our courts is the one arising between the parties to any judgment when there has been an adjudication to which the equitable principle of res judicata applies. The determination of the nature of the obligation simplifies the problem of defenses. "Anything which negatives the existence of that legal obligation, or excuses a defendant from the performance of it, must form a good defense to the action." Godard v. Gray and Schibsby v. Westenholz, supra. If in fact the judgment is a mere expression of sovereign will, which does not involve any actual adjudication of claims put in issue by the parties and tried and determined by the court, the particular principle of res judicata essential to the right of action does not apply, and such fact must negative the obligation of which the judgment is considered as prima facie evidence. If the adjudication resulted from the fraud of the plaintiff, such fraud of necessity vitiates the foundation of the obligation. Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 295; Vadala v. Lawes, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 310. But if, in fact, the final result of the adjudication was not justified by the evidence produced on the trial, such fact cannot constitute a defense. The obligation sought to be enforced is not concerned with the merits of the controversy submitted to adjudication. It arises solely from the fact of such adjudication under the required conditions. The original controversy is not in issue. The trial court has no power to determine that question, nor to review by way of appeal or error the judgment of a foreign court. Messina v. Petrocochino, L. R. 4 P. C. 144. The fact of the judgment and the conditions under which it was rendered are in issue, but not the merits of the controversy adjudicated. Upon the invalidity of such a defense the actual results of decided cases are practically uniform. In all the recent American cases where the courts have refused to receive evidence upon the merits the defendant had appeared in the foreign court and defended. Lazier v. Westcott, 26 N. Y. 146, 151, 82 Am. Dec. 404; Dunstan v. Higgins, 138 N. Y. 70, 20 L. R. A. 668; Baker v. Palmer, 83 Ill. 568; McMullen v. Richie, 41 Fed. Rep. 502, 8 L. R. A. 268. (Since this opinion was written, the opinions in Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 40 L. ed. 95, and Richie v. McMullen, 159 U. S. 235, 40 L. ed. 133, have been filed. In these cases, also, the defendants had appeared in the foreign court, and there had been an actual adjudication upon the claims presented. Whether the exhaustive examination made of the history of this action justifies the theory advanced by a majority of the judges, and whether a theory so novel to English and American law will hereafter control the treatment of defenses by the Federal courts, may be doubtful.) There is a defense which depends rather on a question of evidence. Our municipal law admits in evidence a foreign judgment and foreign law, unless repugnant to the policy of our law, or unjust, and prejudicial to our own subjects. A judgment obnoxious to this exception might not be admissible as evidence, and so the action might be defeated. In Castrique v. Imrie, 30 L. J. C. P. 177, the distinction in this respect between a judgment in rem and in personam was noted. In De Brimont v. Penniman, 10 Blatchf. 436, Fed. Cas. No. 3,715, a demurrer was sustained in an action brought to enforce an obligation between the parties arising in France under French law and established by a French judgment, after full contest by the parties, on the ground that the foreign law and judgment was repugnant to the policy of our law, and did violence to the rights of our citizens. The claim that evidence of a foreign judgment may be rejected because the courts of the state where the judgment was rendered do not receive in evidence our own judgments, would fall under this defense. The object sought by such a claim seems more political than judicial. It is not so much to administer justice in the case on trial as to compel other nations to administer justice in other cases. It may be doubtful whether the accomplishment of such an object by such means fairly comes within the province of a court. Reciprocity is not a principle to be weighed in the scales of justice. It is rather a weapon to be wielded by the executive. The other defenses are the invalidity of the judgment, which must be determined by the law of the state where rendered; payment, release, etc.

In the present case the facts alleged in the second defense conclusively show that no obligation can be predicated in respect to the judgment produced, except that of obedience, imposed by the act of a foreign sovereign, which has no extraterritorial force, and cannot support this action; that the facts technically established by the judgment are conclusive only for the purposes of the action in which it was rendered, and within the limits of the foreign state; that the conditions which, under our law, support a legal obligation between the parties arising from the equities of the case and the ties of natural justice, have no existence. The operation of the principle of res judicata upon facts actually adjudicated, and the equities involved by some actual participation in such adjudication, are essential to the quasi contract obligation this action is brought to enforce. These conditions are negatived by the allegations of the second defense. The demurrer to that defense should, therefore, have been overruled.

The conflict of dicta, and even of results reached in adjudged cases, is such that it is impossible to explain any principle as the real ground of this action without running counter to some general language of courts or text writers. Lord Campbell said, in Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717, 734: "We do not think there would be any advantage in going over the authorities attempting either to reconcile or to contrast them." The conflict which has induced most comment is that between the cases holding that a foreign judgment is prima facie evidence only, and those holding that it is conclusive on the merits of the claim adjudicated. This conflict is substantially reconciled when the true ground of the action is considered. Lord Hardwicke, Chief Justice Eyre, Lord Mansfield, and others, cited in support of the former dictum, were speaking of the judgment when produced as the cause of action, as the ground of a common law obligation; and as such it is only prima facie evidence,—that is, the conditions necessary to raise the obligation do not attach to every foreign judgment. Lord Campbell and others, cited in support of the latter dictum, were speaking of the effect of the judgment when its conditions are such that the common-law obligation is raised. In such case it is conclusive. The merits of the controversy adjudicated cannot be tried in an action to enforce the obligation arising from the fact of that adjudication. But the expressions used when a foreign judgment on default has been under discussion are more variant and less clear and for the most part they have not as yet received practical application. So far as results are concerned, an action has never been sustained by this court, and I believe by no American court, in the case of a foreign judgment rendered on default of appearance, and has rarely been sustained in England. The principal English case is Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686. A Scotchman, absent beyond the seas, was summoned to court by the peculiar process called "horning," which consisted, I believe, in blowing a horn at the cross of Edinburgh. Not responding to the summons, judgment against him was rendered. An action was brought in England to recover the amount of this judgment, and sustained. If the court acted on the theory that the division between the jurisdiction of Scotch and English courts was one imposed by an imperial government in respect to subject provinces, and not the division existing between the courts of foreign and alien states,—a distinction drawn by Lord Selborne in Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote [1894] 2 A. C. 670,—its decision is explicable. On that theory it might well treat the judgment as, in effect, an English judgment, and entitled to execution. Such was the real condition, and forty years later an act of Parliament (the judgment extension act of 1868) recognized its existence, and provided for the execution of Scotch judgments in England and English judgments in Scotland, upon registration. But if the court regarded the action as one to enforce the obligation that arises in respect to a judgment strictly foreign, its conclusion can only be supported on the theory that by force of the ties of allegiance a subject is present for all purposes of adjudication in the courts of his sovereign when commanded to be present, and that this fiction may be treated in such case as the equivalent of an issue actually presented by the parties, tried and determined by the court, and so support an action based upon an obligation arising from such actual adjudication. The court is careful to expressly limit its judgment to "a case where the party owed allegiance to the country in which the judgment was so given against him, from being born in it, and by the laws of which country his property was, at the time the judgment was given, protected;" and when the debt was contracted in the country of the judgment while the debtor resided in it. It is evident that the adoption of such fiction would modify the principle which supports our action on a foreign judgment. Whether any such modification can consistently be recognized, and, if so, to what extent, has not been considered by our courts. This much is certain (and that is enough for the present case): no modification can be so extended as to destroy the principle. It is plain that no action can be sustained in the case of a judgment rendered on default of appearance against one of our own citizens whose only connection with the foreign sovereign was that of a mere passenger through his territory, without wholly ignoring the principle on which the action is based. The proceeding would no longer be a civil action to enforce a common-law obligation, but would be a mere form of obtaining from the court a writ of execution on a foreign judgment. And so the questions which have been discussed in several cases subsequent to Douglas v. Forrest, in respect to the international jurisdiction of a municipal court,—meaning a jurisdiction conferred by a sovereign, and recognized by international law, as distinguished from a jurisdiction so conferred, and not recognized by that law,—were both induced and obscured by an uncertainty as to what the action on a foreign judgment really is. If it is an action to enforce an ordinary obligation arising from the participation of the parties in an adjudication resulting in a valid final judgment, the question of jurisdiction is not a troublesome one. It is settled for most purposes of the action (as in other cases where foreign law is admitted in evidence) by the law of the country where judgment is rendered. But if the proceeding is not an ordinary civil action, but, like debt on a domestic judgment, is a mere form for procuring from our government the issue of an execution on a foreign judgment, then the speculations on the jurisdiction of municipal courts internationally considered, as it is phrased, may be useful, but only as guiding the discretion of the court; for nothing is more fixed than that a municipal judgment cannot receive execution in a foreign country unless by permission of the government of that country; and nothing is more certain than that the conditions of such permission are controlled by no international law or custom, but are determined by the views of public policy held by the authority exercising the sovereign power in granting the permission. The rule is the same whether that authority is judge or king. If our courts assume the power of the government to put in execution within our territory the judgments of foreign sovereigns, they must assume the duty of the government in fixing the conditions on which such executions shall issue. These conditions, of necessity, must be controlled by views of public policy. The duty of the court in this particular is not strictly a judicial one. There is no settled law which dictates the policy. There are variant opinions as to what the international law in respect to the execution of foreign judgments ought to be, supported by reasoning useful in developing a sound theory of jurisprudence; but there is no international law except the universally admitted law that execution can only be granted at the will of the sovereign in whose territory it is sought. The nearest approach to an international rule is the one laid down by Lord Selborne in one of his last opinions: "The plaintiff must sue in the court to which the defendant is subject at the time of the suit (Actor sequitur forum rei) which is rightly stated by Sir Robert Phillimore (International Law, vol. 4, § 891), to lie at the root of all international, and of most domestic, jurisprudence on this matter." Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote, supra. It is true, our municipal law adopts the policy (possibly questionable) of offering our courts for the litigation of the whole world, assuming jurisdiction of any defendant who comes within the range of our process. Within our own limits, such policy is the law. But the adoption by one nation, in the administration of its municipal law, of a policy differing from that on which established international law is based, does not of itself abrogate that law; much less can such municipal policy have the force of international law.

The more important consideration, however, is that there is no international law which recognizes the right of one nation to conclusively determine the legal duties of the subject of another nation who may be temporarily within its limits, in respect to transactions occurring at his own domicil, and not related to any act or conduct within the foreign territory. Territorial jurisdiction, or the right of might to exercise its own will on all persons within its territory, asserted by each independent nation, is countered by the right of protection of its citizens while guests of foreign governments, asserted by every civilized nation. This right of protection is maintained in unmistakable terms by our own government: "The United States believe it to be their duty, and they mean to execute it, to watch over the persons and property of their citizens visiting foreign countries, and to intervene for their protection when such action is justified by existing circumstances and by the law of nations." 2 Whart. Dig. International Law, p. 434. All jurists affirm that the power over the person of a friendly alien who is a mere passenger through a nation's territory is limited to matters relating to his acts and conduct while within that territory. Phillimore emphasizes the warning that the distinction between domiciled persons and visitors or passengers is never to be lost sight of. 2 Phillimore, Interna ional Law, *4. An alien has no legal right, enforceable by action, to enter foreign territory (Musgrove v. Chun Teeong Toy [1891] A. C. 272); but if he is permit ed to enter he carries with him his allegiance to his own country, and is still bound by the laws of that country (Philips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 402; Henderson v. Staniford, 105 Mass. 504). He carries with him the protection of that country, and owes no duty or quasi allegiance to the foreign sovereign which can support the conclusive jurisdiction of his courts, unless in respect to conduct while there, or acts there done. Story, Confl. Laws, § 613

The adjustment of territorial jurisdiction as based on the brute force of might to the principle of protection as based on the reciprocal duties between sovereign and subject, which exist wherever the subject may be, is now making international law It is still within the range of diplomacy. But it is enough for present purposes that there is no international law by which a citizen of London or New York, traveling in Turkey or Morocco, can be compelled, by reason of the mere fact of his casual presence in the foreign country, to there litigate controversies arising at his own domicil. When our court, in the exercise of its assumed power, is asked to grant execution of a judgment based on the right of such compulsion, its decision on the question of policy is controlled by no rule of international law. And certainly there can be no doubt that public policy demands the refusal of execution in such case. It can hardly be claimed that the interests of our own citizens, or friendly intercourse with other nations, will be served by encouraging the establishment of a sort of international syndicate for promoting the collection of home debts through foreign courts, so that each traveler shall be compelled to run the gauntlet of such litigation under threat of snap judgments, upon which his own government must issue execution on his return. Such a policy would offer premiums to scavengers of sham and stale claims at every center of travel, breeding a class of process firers to lie in wait for their game at docks and railway stations. It is certainly significant that since the first case on this subject was reported no English or American court has in fact sustained an action on a foreign judgment, rendered on default against one of its own citizens, in respect to a cause of action arising at his domicil, and that no nation, so far as can be ascertained, has ever suffered such a judgment to be put in execution within its territory. It seems clear to me, notwithstanding some dicta entitled to the highest respect may support a contrary view, that if this proceeding is, as I have attempted to prove, a common law action to enforce a common-law obligation, the facts set up by the defendant constitute a good defense; and if it is—as some general language used by courts, especially of late years, seems to imply—a mere form for procuring the issue of execution on a foreign judgment, the facts set up are conclusive against the issue of execution on the judgment produced.

The argument from analogy, much pressed by counsel, has been substantially disposed of in reaching the conclusions stated. The argument is: (1) A judgment on default obtained in Connecticut against a nonresident, served with process while transiently in the state, is valid and will be enforced in this state. (2) Under the Constitution of the United States, such judgment has the same effect and will be enforced in every other state. (3) Some analogy exists between the relation of the states to each other under the Constitution, and the relation of independent and foreign nations to each other; ergo, such a judgment obtained in a foreign nation will be enforced in the United States. The gap between the premises and the conclusion is patent, and impassable if the essential premise omitted is supplied,—i. e., the sovereign power signified in the judgment of a state court extends, by force of the United States Constitution, to all subjects of the one nation throughout its whole territory; while the sovereign power signified in a foreign judgment does not extend beyond the limits of that nation, and can be recognized elsewhere only by the grace of some other nation. The character of a state judgment as representing the sovereignty of the nation as well as of the state, and so unalterable by state action, is well settled. Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475. Justice Clifford says such judgment is "equally binding and may be executed in every state. The established rule is that, so long as the judgment remains in force, it is of itself conclusive of the right of the plaintiff to the thing adjudged in his favor, and gives him a right to process, mesne or final, as the case may be, to execute the judgment." Such fanciful analogies as the one alleged between the effect of a state and foreign judgment, when produced for execution within the sovereignty of the United States, are unsafe as well as unreal.

There was a clear analogy between the relations of the several states to each other, and the relations of foreign nations, from the opening of the Revolution to its final consummation in the adoption of the Constitution of 1787, and the establishment of the new "composite republic," as it has been aptly termed by Austin. But these analogies were then radically disturbed. The nation and the government established was new, absolutely unique, and cut loose from the traditions and analogies that had formerly prevailed. And so the division of sovereign powers between the people as citizens of one nation and as citizens of its component parts, the relations of such governments to each other, the relations of citizens to the state and to the general government, in their double and not inconsistent capacity of citizens of the United States and of the several states: in short, the new and intricate conditions involved in the establishment of the "indissoluble union of indestructible states,"—must be settled in accordance with the law and circumstances which called the new nation into existence, which law, of necessity, is peculiar to itself. It is only by acknowledging the fact that the relation of our citizens to their government and its several parts are to be determined by a law peculiar to that government, and necessarily distinct from that controlling the relations of foreign governments and their citizens, that we can distinguish between the constitutional law which controls the relations of all states and citizens within the scope of the Federal Constitution, and the international law which controls the relations of foreign nations and their citizens, and be able to accurately apply each law to its appropriate subject. The United States Constitution declares that the act of sovereignty signified in a judgment of one state shall receive execution in every state. International law declares that such act of one nation is not entitled to execution in any other; and the law of this state forbids such execution. The defense in this case brings into sharp contrast the two views of this action which have apparently influenced courts, especially in their discussion of defenses. One view recognizes a common-law obligation arising from facts proved; the other a governmental duty, called into action by the verification of the act of a foreign sovereign. The defenses under one turn on questions of law, under the other on questions of policy. It is therefore essential for the application of any principle to cases as they arise that one or the other view should be frankly adopted, and its logical consequences accepted. For the reasons stated, I believe the view which regards this proceeding as a common-law action to enforce a common-law obligation to be the only one consistent with the established principles of our municipal law, and that such obligation is expressly negatived by the defense in this case. If, however, the other view can be maintained, I believe the defense is sufficient, although for different reasons.

I think there is error in the judgment of the superior court.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Frederick W. BROWN, Petitioner,
v.
Charles Theodore RUSSELL, Jr., et al., Civil Service Commissioners.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The compulsory appointment of veterans, if they desire to be appointed, whenever they make a sworn statement of qualifications with the certificate of three citizens of good repute in the community, which Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2 and 6, attempt to provide for, is inconsistent with the Declaration of Rights, especially art. 7, declaring that government is for the common good "and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men," and art. 6, declaring that no man, corporation, or association shall have any other title to exclusive privileges than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public.

2. Members of the detective department of the district police force, under Pub. Stat. chap. 103, and amendments, who have the powers of police officers and constables, except the service of civil process, are public officers and not merely employees of the commonwealth.

3. The consideration of services rendered to the public within the meaning of art. 6 of the Declaration of Rights, denying any other title than such services to exclusive privileges, has reference to services to be rendered to the public thereafter, and not to past services.

REPORT from the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to remove from the eligible list for appointment under the civil service laws of the name of a veteran which had been placed there without compelling him to submit to a competitive examination. Writ granted.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

The elaborate provision for a careful selection of public servants, the safe guards of examinations, tests of strength, requirements of age, height, and weight, the arrangements of registration, selection, and impartial decision, all disappear the moment a veteran appears and asks for a place. The condition of things as it existed before the act of 1884, when places were often given to inefficient men, as it was charged for political reasons, is made vastly worse for now favoritism is not only permitted, but is required, and no officer having the power of appointment is permitted to make any inquiry into fitness or use any judgment or discrimination in selection.

Such a law paralyzes the service within; it brings it into open contempt without; efficiency and industry go for nothing, capacity is despised, reward of well doing is impossible; responsibility of superior officers for the work of subordinates so forced upon them is out of the question; glaring incapacity, even grotesque physical disability, may stare one in the face anywhere; the ideal of public duty is displaced by that of legalized plunder, and the whole conception of the state is distorted. Surely this law is the destruction of the civil service.

The rewarding of meritorious persons is not such a public purpose as will support, without other public purpose, an act of the legislature. The persons to be rewarded by this act are so many ascertained individuals. These individuals do not make a class, in the sense in which that word is used in cases where a law, passed for a public purpose, and not for the benefit of individuals, nevertheless applies only to a portion of the community, but to that portion as a part of the public. In such laws where valid two things occur: First, a distinct and positive public purpose; second, a class, indefinite as to members though limited by description.

Messrs. Hosea M. Knowlton, Attorney General, and George C. Travis, for respondents:

The intent of the legislature prior to the statute now drawn in question was to declare that military or naval service in time of war was a qualification for appointment or employment in the civil service.

This act was pronounced constitutional by this court.

Opinion of the Justices, 138 Mass. 601; Opinion of the Justices, 145 Mass. 587.

The Constitution of Massachusetts, art. 4, chap. 1, § 1, in prescribing the powers of the general court provides among other things that it is authorized "to name and settle annually or provide by fixed laws for the naming and settling all civil officers within said commonwealth the election and constitution of whom are not hereafter in this form of government otherwise provided for."

In the exercise of this power the legislature has the right to prescribe the qualifications of all officers and servants of the public not provided for in the Constitution.

Opinion of the Justices, supra.

The statutes say that officers, such as ballot commissioners, registrars of voters, and police commissioners, shall be of certain political party affiliations, and the court says that it is "for the legislature to determine whether such a qualification is wise."

Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142.

The Constitution by no means implies that all men are necessarily to receive and have the same civil and political powers and duties. It only signifies that the rights of all under the law are equally entitled to the consideration and protection of the law for their maintenance and security.

Roberts v. Boston, 5 Cush. 198.

Many laws in their effect and operation necessarily confer benefits more or less exclusive upon individual citizens or classes of citizens; but when this is not the design of the law, but only an incident in the exercise of the proper functions of legislative authority, it is not a violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

The purpose of the Declaration of Rights was to announce great and fundamental principles, to govern the action of those who make and administer the law, rather than to establish precise and positive rules of action.

Foster v. Morse, 132 Mass. 354, 42 Am. Rep. 438.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In determining the principal question in this case, it is necessary to consider the statutes relating to the civil service, and particularly Stat. 1895, chap. 501. The previous statutes on the subject are Stat. 1884, chap. 320; Stat. 1887, chap. 437; Stat. 1889, chap. 352; Id. chap. 473; Stat. 1891, chap. 140; Stat. 1893, chap. 95; Id. chap. 253; Stat. 1894, chap. 267; and Stat. 1895, chap. 376. The justices of this court heretofore have had occasion to consider some of these statutes, in an opinion given to the house of representatives on February 24, 1885, and in one given to the governor and council on September 22, 1887. See Opinion of the Justices, 138 Mass. 601; Id. 145 Mass. 587.

By Stat. 1884, chap. 320, § 2, the civil service commissioners to be appointed under the act were authorized to prepare rules not inconsistent with existing laws or with the provisions of the act, and adapted to carry out the purposes thereof, for the selection of persons to fill certain offices in the government of the commonwealth, and of the several cities thereof, which are required to be filled by appointment, and for the selection of persons to be employed as laborers or otherwise in the service of the commonwealth and of the several cities thereof, and the rules were made subject to the approval of the governor and council; and by § 14 the rules were to be given a general or limited application. The commissioners have prepared rules with reference to what is called the "official service of the commonwealth," and of the several cities thereof, and with reference to the labor service, and these rules have been approved by the governor and council. Under the classification of the services made by the rules, there are included in the 1st division, Schedule A, clerks and other persons rendering service as copyists, etc., and, in Schedule B, persons employed in the prison, police, and fire departments, and some other offices. The 2d division includes the labor service. Section 15, Stat. 1884, as amended by Stat. 1893, chap. 95, describes the offices which, under existing laws, cannot be made subject to the civil service rules. It is obvious that the civil service statutes and rules relate only to subordinate offices and employments which have been created by the legislature. None of them is an office or employment of which the duties, tenure, or qualifications are prescribed by the Constitution.

In the present case the petitioner is not a veteran, and, after examination, was placed at the head of the list of candidates eligible for certification and appointment to a position on the detective force of the district police of the commonwealth; and he remained at the head of the list until July, 1895, when the commissioners placed one Edward D. Bean at the head of the list, and reduced the petitioner to the second place. Bean had made application as veteran, under Stat. 1895, chap. 501, § 2, and, having been found to be a veteran, was, without examination, placed first upon the list; and so far as appears, he is the only veteran on the list. The district police are appointed by the governor of the commonwealth, and are subject to removal by the governor. Pub. Stat. chap. 103, § 1. If the governor makes requisition upon the commissioners for a candidate for appointment to the office of a detective upon this police force, it is made the duty of the commissioners, by Stat. 1895, to certify the name of Edward D. Bean for appointment, and of the governor to appoint him, if he appoints anybody. The governor, perhaps, may refuse to appoint anybody, if he is of opinion that Bean is not qualified to perform the duties of a detective on this force, or he may wait until more veterans than one are on the list of persons eligible to such an appointment, and make his selection from them, or he may appoint Bean, and remove him if he finds him incompetent. But then, if Bean is continued on the list and is the only veteran on it or if his application is considered as exhausted by one certification and he makes a new application, the statutes, literally construed, make it the duty of the commissioners to put his name again at the head of the list for appointment, and, on requisition by the governor, again to certify him for appointment, and so on, toties quoties, so long as he remains on the list.

It is to be noticed that the class of veterans as defined by the statutes is not a class which anybody can become qualified to enter by any services which he may perform, or by any attainments which he may acquire, but it is a class fixed and determined by services which were rendered a long time before any of the statutes were passed. It is also to be noticed that the fact of having been a veteran, within the meaning of the statute, in and of itself, has little tendency to show that the applicant is specially qualified to perform the duties of many of the offices to which the civil service statutes and rules relate. The principal purpose of exempting veterans from submitting to an examination must be that veterans sometimes may be appointed to an office or employment who would be found, on examination, not qualified to perform the duties of the office or employment which they seek. One, and perhaps the chief, purpose of the exemption must be to reward veterans for their services in the war of the Rebellion. The reward is not in the nature of a pension or payment of money, but of an office or employment, the salary or pay of which the veteran is to receive. The provisions of the statutes exempting veterans are general in their nature, and relate to all the offices or employments that have been, or may be, included within the civil service rules. From the earliest times, most nations have conferred honors and emoluments upon those persons who have rendered distinguished services to the state, particularly in war. These honors and emoluments have been conferred upon persons voluntarily selected by the legislative body or the sovereign power; and pensions and rewards sometimes have been given to whole classes of persons, of which the statutes of the commonwealth relating to the "aid to soldiers and sailors and to their families," and the statutes of the United States relating to pensions, are well-known examples. But the statute of 1895, under consideration, affords the first instance, so far as we know, in this commonwealth, where the appointing power has been compelled to appoint persons of a certain class to office, in preference to all other persons, whether they are or are not thought to be qualified for the office by the appointing power, or by some public officer, or some impartial and disinterested board of officers or persons invested by law with the power and responsibility of determining the qualifications of the persons to be appointed.

The legislature, in establishing offices not provided for by the Constitution, has often required that the persons, or some of the persons, to be appointed, shall possess certain qualifications, or that some of them shall be women, and some men; but in all cases, so far as we are aware, the qualifications required bear such a relation to the duties imposed that they tend to secure that kind and degree of knowledge, experience, and impartiality which are requisite for the satisfactory performance of the duties, and it is open to any person to acquire the qualifications required. When women are to be appointed, there is a satisfactory reason, in the nature of the office or employment, why this should be done. In every such case some discretion usually has been left to the appointing power, in the selection of the particular persons to be appointed. The peculiarity of the civil service statutes and rules, if Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, be enforced, is that very little is left to the discretion of the appointing power in the selection of persons, if there are veterans who wish to be appointed. The civil service commissioners, in making up the list, and in certifying the persons to be appointed, must proceed in a certain way, designated by the statutes and the rules; and the appointments must be made, if at all, from the persons so certified. Before the passage of Stat. 1895, chap. 501, it was in the discretion of the appointing power whether veterans who had been put upon any list without an examination, pursuant to Stat. 1887, chap. 437, should or should not be certified for appointment by the commissioners; and it was also in the discretion of the appointing power whether, if such veterans were certified, they should be appointed. But if veterans make application, under Stat. 1895, chap. 501, § 2, they are to be preferred "for certification and appointment in preference to all other applicants not veterans, except women;" and, as separate lists are made up for the different offices and employments, appointments from each list must be made from veterans, if any man is appointed, and there are veterans on the list.

It ought, perhaps, to be considered whether it is intended that veterans who make application for employment in the service under Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, shall not only file a petition in accordance with § 6, but shall also conform in their application to the requirements of the 2d section of rule 12 of the civil service rules, pursuant to § 2. We are of the opinion that it was the intention of the statute that the application, under this statute, of a veteran who does not wish to submit to an examination, should be made in accordance with the requirements of both the 2d section of rule 12 of the civil service rules, and § 6 of the Statute. See opinion in 145 Mass. 587.

It may perhaps be doubted whether it is the intention of Stat. 1895 that, if a veteran makes application pursuant to § 2, his application shall be taken to be conclusively true, or that the commissioners shall inquire into the truth of the statements contained in the application. Stat. 1891, chap. 140, gives the commissioners ample power to make investigation in all cases requiring it, and the only question is, What is the intention of Stat. 1895? The commissioners must of necessity inquire and determine whether an applicant is a veteran, according to the meaning of this statute; otherwise he has no right to make the application, under § 2. We have, however, found it unnecessary, in the present case, to determine whether the commissioners may also inquire into the truth of the statements made in the application, to the effect that he has not suffered loss of limb, or other physical impairment which incapacitates him from performing the duties of the position which he seeks; that he is a citizen of the United States; that he does not habitually use intoxicating beverages to excess, and is not a vender of intoxicating liquor, and has not been convicted within one year of any offense against the laws of the commonwealth. Whether they can make these inquiries or not we are unable to see in the statutes any indication that the legislature intended that the commissioners should examine a veteran who makes application under Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, with reference to his moral character, or his mental acquirements and capacity to perform the duties of the position which he seeks. If the commissioners were to do this, and were to certify to the appointing officer only such veterans as they found to be of good moral character, and mentally as well as physically qualified to perform the duties of the position which they seek, there would be little difference, under this statute, between the position of veterans who desire an appointment without having passed any examination, and that of those who submit themselves to an examination. We think the intention of Stat. 1895 is that the sworn statement of the applicant that he is qualified to perform the duties of the position which he seeks, accompanied by a certificate from three citizens, of good repute in the community, that they know said applicant to be fully competent to perform such duties, is to be taken by the commissioners for the purpose of certification to the appointing power, and by the appointing power as conclusive upon the mental and moral qualifications of the applicant. The certificate of three citizens is not required to be under oath, and it may be made by any three persons of good repute whom the applicant may select. It is not made under any sense of official responsibility, and the persons making it are not required to be impartial or disinterested. They may be the friends or relations or servants of the applicant. Stat. 1895, chap. 501, § 2, provides "that the age limit now established by the civil service rules with regard to appointments in the police and prison service and fire department may be applied to" appointments under this section; but this seems to be the only clear provision that the commissioners may exclude from certain offices and employments veterans who make the requisite application, accompanied by the requisite statement and certificate, and the exclusion can be made only on account of age, in accordance with the age limit established by the civil service rules when Stat. 1895, chap. 501, took effect.

It is the contention of the petitioner that the privileges given to veterans by Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, are in violation of the principles which underlie our system of government, implied in the Constitution of the commonwealth, and also are in violation of certain express provisions of the Constitution. The express provisions relied on are found in articles 6 and 7 of the Declaration of Rights, and reference is also made to article 9. It is not contended that article 9 in terms is applicable to the present case. This article is as follows: "All elections ought to be free; and all the inhabitants of this commonwealth, having such qualifications as they shall establish by their frame of government, have an equal right to elect officers, and to be elected for public employments." This article relates to elections, and to inhabitants who have such qualifications as are established by the frame of government. The civil service statutes do not relate to elections, or to any offices, the qualifications for which are established by the Constitution; but the article, so far as it extends, does declare the principle that all persons having the requisite qualifications have an equal right to elect, and to be elected, to public office.

Article 7 is as follows: "Government is instituted for the common good, for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people, and not for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men. Therefore, the people alone have an incontestable, unalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government, and to reform alter, or totally change the same when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it." This article is declarative of the end of the institution of government. It may be said to be fairly within the intent of this article that public offices, which are the instrumentalities of government, ought not to be created or filled for the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men, but only for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people, and for the common good.

Article 6 is as follows: "No man, nor corporation, or association of men, have any other title to obtain advantages, or particular and exclusive privileges, distinct from those of the community, than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public; and this title being in nature neither hereditary, nor transmissible to children, or descendants, or relations by blood, the idea of a man born a magistrate, law-giver, or judge, is absurd and unnatural." From the conclusion of this article, it is manifest that it is mainly directed against hereditary offices and privileges, but it is contended that this is not its whole purpose. It is said that the mention of corporations and associations of men shows that hereditary privileges were not solely intended, because corporations and associations of men have no heirs, although they may be perpetual. We think it obvious that, whatever may be the advantages of particular and exclusive privileges mentioned, they may include advantages and privileges for life, or a definite period of time as well as hereditary advantages and privileges. We think, for example, that a peerage for life, with the privileges which attach to a peerage by English law, cannot be conferred, in this commonwealth, upon any person, any more than can an hereditary peerage. It has been argued, on the one hand, that the words, "other than what arises from the consideration of services rendered to the public," mean or include services which have been rendered to the public in the past, and that if a man, corporation, or association of men has rendered services to the public in the past, it is consistent with this article that he may obtain advantages or particular and exclusive privileges in consideration of those services. On the other hand, it is argued that it is only in consideration of services to be rendered to the public therefor that a man, corporation, or association of men may obtain advantages, or particular and exclusive privileges. This provision is said to have been taken from the Declaration of Rights in the Constitution of Virginia of 1776, § 4, where it reads as follows: "That no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services; which not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge, to be hereditary." In our opinion, the meaning of these words in this article, so far as they are applicable to public offices, is that only in consideration of services to be rendered to the public therefor can a man, corporation, or association of men obtain advantages or particular and exclusive privileges distinct from those of the community. A person may obtain the advantages or privileges attached to a public office in consideration of his performing the duties of the office. It is for the purpose of rendering service to the public in a public office that advantages and privileges distinct from those of the community may be obtained. The meaning of this article was somewhat considered in Hewitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353, and it was held that Stat. 1818, chap. 113, was not in violation of the article. It was there held that the leading purpose of that statute was to guard the public against ignorance, negligence, and carelessness in the practice of physic and surgery, and that the exclusive privileges granted to such persons as shall have been licensed by the officers of the Massachusetts Medical Society, or have been graduated doctors of medicine from Harvard University, were only incidental to the leading purpose of the statute. In that case, as in others where a license is required before any one can engage in certain professions or pursuits, a service is rendered to the public by the exercise on the part of those licensed of the skill, knowledge, and experience required to obtain a license, and by the exclusion of ignorant and incapable persons from the profession or pursuit. But it may be questioned whether this article of the Declaration of Rights was intended to apply to private pursuits and employments, and whether it is not to be confined to political and civil rights and privileges.

The original statute of 1884, chap. 320, concerning the civil service, required that the rules should provide "for giving preference in appointments to office and promotions in office (other qualifications being equal) to applicants who served in the army or navy of the United States in time of war and have been honorably discharged therefrom." Id. § 14. It may be said that, other qualifications being equal, there are reasons to believe that a veteran soldier or sailor often will make a better civil officer than a person who never has been subjected to the discipline of service in war; and it is distinctly a public purpose to promote patriotism, and to make conspicuous and honorable any exhibition of courage, constancy, and devotion to the welfare of the state shown in the public service. These things, we assume, the legislature may take into account, in providing for appointments to office, where the qualifications are not prescribed by the Constitution. Stat. 1887, chap. 437, provides that veterans may be preferred for appointment to office or employment in the service of the commonwealth, or the cities thereof, without having passed an examination under the civil service rules. This statute only gives a discretion to the appointing power, which it may or may not exercise, according to the needs of the public service. See also Stat. 1889, chap. 473. Stat. 1895, chap. 501, § 1, amending Stat. 1884, chap. 320, § 14, makes compulsory the certification and appointment of veterans who have been examined and found qualified for the positions they seek, in preference to all other persons, but they must submit to the same examination as other persons. The constitutionality of this section of the statute is not now before us. The purpose of Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, is to make the appointment of veterans compulsory, if they desire to be appointed, whether the appointing power of the commissioners think they are or are not qualified to perform the duties of the office or employment they seek. Section 6 requires a sworn statement of the applicant that he is qualified to perform the duties of the position he seeks, but it is notorious that persons the least qualified to perform the duties of an office often are the readiest to believe that they are qualified to perform them, and this provision cannot be seriously taken as a reasonable and adequate method of ascertaining the qualifications of applicants for office or employment. Probably it was because the legislature felt that this requirement was not adequate that the certificate of three citizens of good repute was also required. But the obvious defect in this requirement is that the applicant may select the three citizens, and they are not required to have any knowledge of the qualifications required, or to be disinterested or impartial, or to act under any sense of public responsibility. A man cannot properly be a judge in his own case, or make his servants and agents the judges. Such a certificate cannot be regarded as a reasonable, impartial, and adequate method of determining the qualifications of applicants for appointment to office or employment, if it be necessary, under the Constitution, that all persons appointed to office or employment should be adjudged by somebody to be qualified to perform the duties of the office or employment.

The principal question of law in this case, broadly stated, is therefore as follows: Can the legislature constitutionally provide that certain public offices and employments which it has created shall be filled by veterans in preferment to all other persons, whether the veterans are or are not found or thought to be actually qualified to perform the duties of the offices and employments by some impartial and competent officer or board charged with some public duty in making the appointments? If such legislation is not constitutional as regards public offices, the question incidentally may arise whether a distinction can be made between public offices, and employments by the public which are not offices. Public offices are created for the purpose of effecting the ends for which government has been instituted which are the common good, and not the profit, honor, or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men. In our form of government, it is fundamental that public offices are a public trust, and that the persons to be appointed should be selected solely with a view to the public welfare. In offices which are created by the legislature, where the method of appointment is not prescribed by the Constitution, the legislature can take upon itself the responsibility of selecting the persons to be appointed, or can confer the power of appointment upon public officers or boards, or upon the inhabitants of cities, towns, or districts; but we think that it is inconsistent with the nature of our government, and particularly with articles 6 and 7 of our Declaration of Rights, that the appointing power should be compelled by legislation to appoint to public offices persons of a certain class, in preference to all others, without the exercise on its part of any discretion, and without the favorable judgment of some legally constituted officer or board designated by law to inquire and determine whether the persons to be appointed are actually qualified to perform the duties which pertain to the offices.

There are many employments by the commonwealth, or by the cities and towns of the commonwealth, which do not constitute the employee a public officer. The work of the commonwealth and of the cities and towns must be done by agents or servants, and much of it is of the nature of an employment. It is sometimes difficult to make the distinction between a public office and an employment, yet the title of "public office" is one well known to the law, and it often is necessary to determine what constitutes a public office. Every copying clerk or janitor of a public building is not necessarily a public officer. With reference to such and similar employments, it may be suggested that, if the legislature can give pensions to veteran soldiers and sailors, it may grant them on condition that the pensioners shall render such service to the commonwealth, or to its cities and towns, as they can; that they may be employed and paid wages or a salary, partly in consideration of the services they render, and partly in recognition of, and as a reward for, the services which they have rendered to the commonwealth in the past. We have not found it necessary, however, in the present case to consider the authority of the legislature to grant pensions or pecuniary rewards for past services to the state, whether the pensions and rewards be absolute, or conditional upon the rendering of some service, because, in our opinion, the persons appointed to the detective department of the district police force of the commonwealth, under Pub. Stat. chap. 103, and the acts in amendment thereof, are public officers, and not merely employees of the commonwealth. They are appointed by the governor for the term of three years, subject to removal by the governor, and they "have and exercise throughout the commonwealth all the powers of constables (except the service of civil process), police officers, and watchmen, and may be transferred from one district to another, in the discharge of their duties; and the governor may at any time command their services in suppressing riots and in preserving the peace." They give bonds to the treasurer of the commonwealth, and receive a stated salary from the treasury of the commonwealth. They have and exercise some of the powers of the government. We are of opinion that §§ 2, 6, Stat. 1895, chap. 501, so far as they purport absolutely to give to veterans particular and exclusive privileges, distinct from those of the community, in obtaining public office, cannot be upheld as enactments within the constitutional power of the general court. The result is that the commissioners were not authorized by Stat. 1895, chap. 501, §§ 2, 6, to place, without an examination, the name of Edward D. Bean at the head of the list to be certified for appointment upon the detective force of the district police of the commonwealth, in preference to all other applicants not veterans or women, and that they should be commanded to strike his name from the list.

Mandamus to issue accordingly.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

COLUMBUS BUGGY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
TURLEY & PARKER.

(.....Miss.....)

1. Indorsers for one doing business in his own name who are compelled to pay the note are creditors within the protection of Code 1892, § 4234, making property used or acquired by such person in his business liable for his debts, and they may secure themselves by taking a bill of sale of such property.

2. Goods sold to a trader for resale under a contract retaining title in the vendor until they are paid for and making the purchaser agent for their sale are required or used in his business within the meaning of Code 1892, § 4234, making such property of one doing business under his own name without disclosing his principal or partner liable for his debts.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Adams County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain personal property which defendants had purchased of J. M. Smitha but which plaintiff alleged belonged to it. Affirmed.

Appellant delivered to Smitha some buggies under a written contract, he paying part cash and giving a note for the balance of the purchase price. Under the contract Smitha was to hold the goods and their proceeds as agent for plaintiff until they were paid for in full and in making sales he was to act as agent for plaintiff.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Martin & Conner, for appellant:

An agent can act only within the scope of his authority or in accord with the usage of trade; and whenever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied by his agent or a trust fund converted into another species of property if the identity can be traced it may be followed by the owner or held in its new form liable to his rights.

This was an agreement, to the knowledge of both parties, that the transfer should be made in consideration of the extinguishment of an antecedent debt of Smitha; it was a transaction involving property which Smitha held only as agent; it was done far out of the usual course of trade; it was done under circumstances and with such knowledge on the part of appellees as the law terms "notice;" under circumstances where a reasonable man of ordinary prudence would, and appellees, with every facility and perfect ease, could and should, have made inquiry which would have revealed the rights of appellant.

Warner v. Martin, supra; Journey v. Priestly, 70 Miss. 584.

An agent holding property of his principal for sale may make a valid sale thereof in market overt or in the usual course of his employment, but cannot transfer or dispose of the same in payment of his own debts, and this whether the transferee or pledgee was ignorant of the rights of the principal.

In sales of personalty where the prepayment of the price is made a condition precedent, no title passes to the vendee. Especially is this the case where title is expressly reserved by the vendor.

If personal property is sold upon condition precedent, as the prepayment of the purchase price, and title is impliedly or expressly reserved to the vendor, no title passes to the vendee; the vendor may follow the property in the hands of innocent third persons who have acquired the same for value or of seizing creditors of the vendee.

Annotated Code, § 4234, known as the "business sign" section, does not apply to the sale involved in the case at bar.

The object of this statute was to prevent the assertion of secret rights that would operate as fraud upon innocent parties.

It is not pretended that appellant had any right or interest in Smitha's business other than that of persons who might have sold him property under similar circumstances or of his general creditors. The bulk of the commercial business of this country is done upon terms of credit. On account of the losses to creditors many of them adopted the plan of reserving in themselves title to their goods until paid for, and the majority of the courts of the union have decided that such sales were perfectly fair, equitable, and legitimate.

If a fraud were committed upon any one in such a case, would it not be upon the owner of property who on the faith of the security given him by the established law of a state should part with the possession of his property on terms of security theretofore sufficient for his protection, and then be told that his security is worthless?

Notice did not affect a creditor asserting his rights.

Messrs. Proby & Clinton for appellees.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following excerpt from the agreed statement of facts found in the transcript will demonstrate that appellees were creditors of Smitha in the sum of $1,700, viz.: Smitha, being "insolvent, and in failing circumstances, and owing the banking house of Britton & Koontz the sum of $1,700 upon notes dated February 27, 1894, and January 11, 1895, shortly falling due, on which the said defendants, Turley & Parker, were accommodation indorsers, proposed to the said defendants that as he (Smitha) would be unable to meet said notes at maturity, and as they would have them to pay, that if they (Turley & Parker) would take up said notes and assume certain other obligations owing by said Smitha, that he (Smitha) would make them a bill of sale to the property hereafter mentioned; that the said defendants did take up said notes by the payment of the $1,700, and assumed the payment of $600, due by said Smitha for rent in arrears; whereupon the said Smitha, on the 16th day of February, 1895, in consideration of a receipt in full for the $1,700 paid by the defendants, and the assumption of the payment of said $600, sold his said business, including horses, carriages, buggies, harness, book accounts, etc., to the said defendants, Turley & Parker." It thus appearing that appellees were creditors of Smitha, under the authority of Howe v. Kerr, 69 Miss. 311, they are clearly entitled to be protected by the sale to them by their debtor to the extent of the $1,700. Section 4234, Code 1892 (Code 1880, § 1300), protects the rights acquired by appellees under the sale to them from their debtor to the extent indicated. The agreed statement of facts shows that Smitha transacted the business of a livery and sales stable, including the sale of carriages, buggies, etc., and that the only sign used at the place of such business was one with the words, "J. M. Smitha, Proprietor," and that the property in this litigation was used and acquired in that business. As to Smitha's creditors, the property was liable for his debts, and was in all respects to be treated as his property in favor of his creditors. As was said in Howe v. Kerr: "They [the creditors] might have subjected it [the property in controversy] to their demands by proceeding at law to judgment and execution, and what the law would have done it was permissible for the parties to do." As to the debt of $600, due by Smitha for rent, and assumed by appellees, § 4234, Code 1892*, has no applicability. To the extent of this $600 Turley & Parker were purchasers.

This brings us to the remaining contention, viz.: Can the purchasers be protected in their title to the property thus acquired from Smitha against the claim of appellants, Smitha's vendors, who by their written contract with Smitha, retained title to the property conditionally sold him until the purchase price should be paid Smitha being a trader actively engaged in the business of livery and selling carriages and buggies, and having authority in the contract itself to sell? The propounding of the proposi-

*That section was as follows:

Section 4234 (Code of 1880, § 1300): Business sign, and what to contain. If any person shall transact business as a trader or otherwise, with the addition of the words, "agent," "factor," "and company," or "& Co.," or like words, and fail to disclose the name of his principal or partner by a sign in letters easy to be read, placed conspicuously at the house where such business is transacted, or if any person shall transact business in his own name without any such addition, all the property, stock, money, and choses in action used or acquired in such business shall, as to the creditors of any such person, be liable for his debts, and be in all respects treated in favor of his creditors as his property.

tion discloses features which distinguish the case from those where the conditional sale is made of articles for the use and consumption of the buyer, or when the property is not sold to a trader presumptively for resale, but for the use of the buyer. The books, including our own state reports, abound in cases of these characters, and the rule is well settled with us that here, in such cases, the title of the conditional sale will be protected. The present case is wholly unlike any heretofore decided in this court, and must be determined independently of former adjudications. In the case before us the vehicles were presumably sold to Smitha for resale. The course of business and common observation would, perhaps, raise that presumption. But no resort need be necessarily had to presumption. The seller has, in its contract, expressly authorized a resale by its vendee. True, the contract shows a retention of title in the seller until payment fully made, but, true also is it, the seller has authorized the buyer to resell. To resell was one of the two purposes had in view by both parties to the contract. Now, what effect shall be given to these conflicting and inconsistent terms of the contract? And especially what effect shall be given to these inconsistent terms when the buyer is not only apparently clothed with all the indicia of ownership, but when by the contract itself, the jus disponendi is unequivocally conferred on the buyer? It would seem that only one answer can be returned to these questions. To permit the vendor in a conditional sale of personal property, bought in the course of trade for resale, to retain title, and at the same time authorize the buyer to resell, would operate as a fraud upon innocent purchasers. This case falls within a well-recognized exception to the general rule that no one can convey to another any better title than he himself has. Benjamin in his work on Sales (§§ 448, 449) states with perspicuity this exception. In § 448, vol. 1, 4th Am. ed., the author uses this language: "The seller may be estopped from claiming title, as against a bona fide purchaser from the buyer in possession, by giving the buyer evidence of title or authority to sell." And in the succeeding section an elaborate citation from Leigh Bros. v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 58 Ala. 165, is made, in which the exception to the maxim, Nemo dat qui non habet, is strongly presented. Said Brickell, Ch. J., in that case: "If the person intrusted with the possession of the goods, and with the indicia of ownership, or of authority to sell, or otherwise dispose of them, in violation of his duty to the owner, sells to an innocent purchaser, the sale will prevail against the right of the owner." To the same effect the following cases will be found: Wilder v. Wilson, 16 Lea, 548; Winchester Wagon Works & Mfg. Co. v. Carman, 109 Ind. 31, 58 Am. Rep. 382; Ludden v. Hazen, 31 Barb. 650; Fitzgerald v. Fuller, 19 Hun, 180; Cole v. Mann, 62 N. Y. 1; Armington v. Houston, 38 Vt. 448, 91 Am. Dec. 366; Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222; Burbank v. Crooker, 7 Gray, 158, 66 Am. Dec. 470; Haskins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 514; McMahon v. Sloan, 12 Pa. 229, 51 Am. Dec. 601.

The only case seen by us in direct conflict with the view which we adopt as the second one is that of Lewis v. McCabe, 49 Conn. 41, 44 Am. Rep. 217. But that opinion seems to have rested largely upon the idea that the contract in that litigation was made upon and induced by the spirit and drift of the former Connecticut decisions in similar, though not identical, cases. Near the conclusion of that opinion this language is employed: "Possession, with the jus disponendi added, has been regarded by many courts as a sufficient reason for declaring a contract colorable and fraudulent without regard to the real intent of the parties. Bump, Fraud. Conv. 123, and cases there referred to. We concede that there is much force in the reasoning supporting such a rule, but at the same time we must bear in mind the spirit and drift of our own decisions as they may have induced the making of such contracts." Many states have of late years enacted statutes requiring the recordation of contracts in which title is retained in the vendor, and many adjudications may be found under such statutes; but the cases cited by us were decided independently of statute, and, as it appears, before the enactment of statutes.

YAZOO & MISSISSIPPI VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

J. C. DAVIS et al.

(.....Miss.....)

1. Whether an obstructed bayou was a watercourse or not may be upon the evidence a question for the jury.

2. The fact that overflows of surface water and water from a river and streams upon low land are somewhat deepened and somewhat more prolonged when they occur on account of the construction of a railroad embankment with large and numerous trestles to provide for the passage of the water does not make the railroad company liable where there is nothing to show that trestles in lieu of the embankment would be as economical or make as safe and proper a roadway.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Leflore County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful obstruction by defendant of water flowing over plaintiffs' land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mayes & Harris and Rush & Gardner for appellant.

Messrs. Coleman & Somerville for appellees.

NOTE.—On the question, What is surface water? including the subject of overflowing river banks, see note to Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Brevoort (C. C. D. Ind.) 25 L. R. A. 527.

Cooper, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Sinai v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 71 Miss. 547, we held that under circumstances a railroad company whose roadbed obstructed surface water, and threw it back upon the lands of the adjoining owner, would be liable to him for the damages thereby inflicted. In Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Smith, 72 Miss. 677, 27 L. R. A. 762, we also held that under circumstances a railroad company would not be liable to an adjoining owner for obstructing the flood waters of a stream, which were flowing in an unbroken current along the course of the stream, and which would ordinarily, under the rules of the common law, be considered and dealt with as a part of the stream. We need not state the facts of those cases, nor repeat at length what was therein said of the legal principles on which the decisions rest. In the present appeal the facts are substantially these: The appellees own a tract of land near the junction of Big Sand creek and the Yallobusha river. The river flows from the northeast to the southwest, and the general course of the appellant's road is parallel with the river, and from a mile to a mile and a half east thereof. Big Sand creek comes in from the southeast, flowing to the northwest, until near the appellees' land when it is turned to the northeast, and, after passing a mile or more in that direction, turns to the north, and then, running nearly west, empties into the river. After leaving the lands of appellees, and before reaching the river, Big Sand creek receives the waters of Teoc creek, a stream flowing from southeast to northwest. In the irregular parallelogram between the river and the creek the roadbed of the defendant runs at a distance of a mile or more from the river, and of a half mile, more or less, from the creek. Running out from the Big Sand creek, and in the direction of the river, at its nearest points, are several bayous, with clearly defined, but not deep, channels. These bayous continue as such beyond the line of the railroad, and some of them—possibly all—lose their character, and are merged into the basin east of the river. When the waters of the creek are high, and those of the river are low, the water from the creek, and the overflowing waters, and surface waters run down through these bayous to, or towards, the river. But when the waters of the river are at flood, they run eastward through the bayous to the creek. This was the condition of things before the railroad was built, and from this it appears that the lands of the plaintiffs, situated between the creek and the river, are in a sort of basin, which have in a greater or less degree been always subject to overflow; the waters of the Big Sand creek overflowing them from east to west when the river was low and the creek high, and the waters from the river overflowing them from west to east when the river was at flood. East of the creek are other lands of the plaintiffs, and damages in this action are sought for the injury done to the lands, both east and west of the creek. When the railroad was constructed, in the year 1886, much of it, for the first mile or two, south of the point where it crossed Big Sand creek, was built upon trestles. In the year 1892 the company filled up a large portion of these trestles with earth, forming, when filled, a solid roadbed; but, as appears from a map used on the trial of the cause, and made a part of this record, there yet remains about 1,800 feet of trestlework (including the bridge of 300 feet across the Big Sand) from the point where the road crosses the creek to the first bayou south of and adjoining plaintiffs' land, and of these trestles nearly 1,000 feet are over the bayous and along the lowlands of the plaintiffs' farms. The plaintiffs allege: That their "said lands are situated in what is known as the 'Yazoo and Mississippi Delta,' and are almost level. That there are occasional elevations into ridges of slight elevation, and occasional depressions of slight extent, which latter at certain seasons overflowed. That the streams passing through and near to said lands are very shallow, and their waters flow very sluggishly. That the beds and banks of the streams are incapable of containing the waters in the rainy seasons, but they are bordered by low or overflowed lands, which at such times assist in carrying off the excess. That all of the small streams, bayous, and sloughs, and creeks draining the said lands flow in a westerly direction, and empty into the Yallobusha river, which river flows in a south-westerly direction, but with a winding course, about 2 miles distant from their lands. Said lands are about 3 or 4 miles distant from what is known as the 'Hills,' where the surface of the earth rises abruptly into hills of great elevation and dimensions; that there is a gradual slope in the earth's surface westward from the foot of the hills to the Yallobusha river, and the usual and ordinary waters passing through and near to the lands aforesaid from the east found egress in a harmless course, by the two creeks, Big Sand and Teoc, into the river. That in the rainy season, which annually occurs in the spring of the year, as well as at other times of heavy rainfalls, quantities of water rush down from the high lands, and, overflowing the two creeks, passed into the adjacent low and overflowed lands, and were conveyed from off the lands of the plaintiffs by four streams or bayous, to wit, Sand Bayou and a prong of Sand Bayou, Stump Bayou, and a prong of Stump Bayou." The declaration further alleges that when the railroad was built trestles of sufficient sizes were left for the passage of the waters, but that the defendant, without due regard to the rights of the plaintiffs, in the year 1892 filled up a large part of the trestles, obstructed the bayous, and left insufficient escape for the waters, thus throwing them back upon plaintiffs' lands, increasing the depth of the water upon the lands that were accustomed to overflow, overflowing other lands, and materially prolonging the period for which the overflows remained on the lands.

Stating the case, as found, most favorably for the plaintiffs, it may be said that their property consists of what is known as "low lands," subject to overflow in great part by ordinary floods, with a few ridges, of not great extent, parts of which were above ordinary overflows, and possibly a small part not subject to overflows even in exceptionally high water; that the construction of the road and the filling in of the trestles has to some extent deepened the overflows from the surface water and the waters from Big Sand creek, where the Yallobusha river is low, and subjected to overflow on the whole body of the land, from 30 to 100 acres, which, but for the roadway, might have been brought into cultivation; that no additional land is subject to overflow from the Yallobusha river, but that overflows from that river as well as from the Big Sand are somewhat prolonged in time when they do occur. There is no evidence that the road is improperly constructed, except as may be inferred from the foregoing facts; and there is nothing to show that to construct and mantain trestles would be as economical as to make the roadbed, or that, when constructed, they would form as safe or proper roadway. It is affirmatively shown that the trestles or bridges at the creek and at all of the bayous, except one, are of far greater capacity than the bayous and the creek, and it is not shown that any appreciable or ascertainable injury has resulted from obstructing that bayou, the water flowing through that having been turned southward along the railroad, and emptying now into Stump Bayou. The peremptory instruction prayed by the defendant was properly refused, for the reason that, whether this obstructed bayou was a water course was, under the evidence, a question for the jury; and if it was, the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs for such injury as they sustained by its obstruction, and if no injury could be proved to nominal damages. Chapman v. Copeland, 55 Miss. 476. In all other respects the course of the trial,—the instructions given and refused,—proceeded along radically erroneous lines.

The fundamental error which colored and controlled the whole case was that the defendant company was under the duty of so constructing its roadway as to afford exit for all except "unprecedented" overflows, and in treating the filling of its trestles on lowlands as obstructions of a water course. Nature failed to afford sufficient exits for the waters which are the source of the plaintiffs' injury, and it is not the law that the defendant was under the duty of so constructing its roadway as to preserve the land of the plaintiffs from all injury by reason of water to which it would not have been subject in its natural state. The plaintiffs' farm is so situated as to be subject to a sort of ebb and flow inundation, sometimes from the eastern waters of Big Sand creek, at others from the western waters of the Yallobusha river. Through this basin, the company, either by contract or condemnation, obtained a right to locate its roadway. Power was conferred upon it by the legislature to build the road, on condition only that by contract or condemnation proceedings it should compensate the owners whose property was to be taken. This it has done, and is the owner of the land, with the right to use it as such, for the legitimate purposes for which it was secured. For all injuries flowing from the lawful and proper construction of its roadway it has already paid. In condemnation proceedings, all special damages, present and prospective, to the owners of land, resulting or to result from properly constructing and maintaining its road, constitute, as to such owner, a single indivisible cause of action, and it is conclusively presumed that the commissioners in making their award in cases of condemnation have considered and awarded damages for all such injuries; and, if the way has been secured by contract with the owner, that he has demanded and received full compensation therefor. And if it may reasonably be supposed that a proper construction of the road will subject adjoining land to overflow, or obstruct its drainage, such damages should be estimated and allowed for. Sullivan v. Lafayette County Supers. 58 Miss. 790; Yazoo-Mississippi Delta Levee Comrs. v. Harkleroads, 62 Miss. 807; Richardson v. Levee Comrs. 68 Miss. 539; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wachter, 123 Ill. 440; Barnes v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 65 Mich. 251; Bell v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 101 N. C. 21; Moss v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 85 Mo. 86.

It is evident that to construct a road on lands situated as were the plaintiffs would inevitably, to some extent, obstruct the body of vagrant water, composed of both overflow and surface water, to which, in a state of nature, the plaintiffs' lands were subject. The roadway, except where it crosses the defined banks of the streams and bayous, is in no proper sense within a water course. The alluvial lands of the Yazoo and Mississippi delta were all built up by the deposits from the rivers. In a state of nature it is all subject to overflow, and if the roads in that country are to be so constructed as to preserve the nearest possible approach to a natural condition of the waters, they must be placed upon trestles from one end of the valley to the other. We withdraw nothing of what we said in Sinai v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 71 Miss. 547.

A company having the right to construct its railroad may not, in disregard of the rights of adjoining proprietors, so construct its roadbed as to destroy the value of the lands of third persons, even though the injury be occasioned by turning back surface water upon such lands, if, with due regard to the duty it owes to the public, and in the reasonable use of its own property, and at no undue expense, it can avoid it, by putting in trestles, culverts, or other openings, through which such water may safely be allowed to escape. But that is not this case. On the contrary, to require the company to refrain from building its roadway by putting up embankments necessary to raise its line above the periodical floods, where large and numerous trestles are provided to give vent to the surrounding waters, would be to subordinate its rights of property to the unfounded demands of the adjoining owner, who has already received full compensation for the injury of which he complains.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

W. S. HARVEY, Trustee, etc., Appt.,
v.
LINVILLE IMPROVEMENT COMPANY et al.

(.....N. C.....)

1. A pooling arrangement by which stockholders transfer their shares to trustees to be voted as directed by holders of the majority thereof for the period of five years unless the holders of two thirds of such stock vote to put an end to the trust sooner is contrary to public policy and void as against the right of an assignee of some of the trustees' certificates to have the shares thereby represented issued to him in his own name and under his own control.
2. Voting or controlling stock under a pooling arrangement which is against public policy may be restrained by injunction at suit of the real owner of the stock.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Caldwell County denying an injunction and other relief in a proceeding brought to restrain defendants from carrying out a pooling agreement for the voting of stock in a corporation. Reversed.

Plaintiff had purchased certain shares of stock in the Linville Improvement Company, and when he sought to obtain possession of them he found them in the hands of trustees under an alleged pooling contract by which a certain number of shares would be held and voted for the furtherance of certain interests of the owners. He instituted this suit to enjoin the execution of the agreement and to procure control of the stock. The pooling contract was as follows:

"Whereas the Linville Improvement Company is indebted to various persons in large sums of money, and is now in the hands of a receiver, appointed by a decree of the superior court of the county of Mitchell in the state of North Carolina; and whereas, the undersigned, who are stockholders, and some of whom are also creditors, of the said company, are desirous to extricate the company from its present financial embarrassment, pay off its debts, and enable it to resume its operations: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned stockholders of the Linville Improvement Company, have agreed, and do hereby agree, with each other as follows: That for the purpose herein set forth, we will pool all of the stock of the said company owned by us, respectively, and will transfer the same to John F. Divine, T. B. Lenoir, and Hugh MacRae, to be held by them and their successors upon the trusts and for the purposes herein declared. The said trustees shall give proper receipts for the stock so transferred to them. The said trustees shall have power to vote the said stock so transferred to them in all meetings of the stockholders of said company, to borrow money to pay off and discharge the present indebtedness of the company, and to pledge the stock so held by them, or any part of it, as collateral security for the money so borrowed. If any vacancy among the said trustees shall occur at any time, the same shall be filled by the votes of the holders of the majority of the stock represented in the agreement. And the holders of the majority of such stock shall have the right, whenever they see proper to do so, to instruct the said trustees how to vote upon matters arising or to arise in any meeting of the stockholders of said company. Any one or two of the said trustees may vote the entire stock so transferred to them in any meeting of the stockholders of said company, being so duly authorized in writing by the other or others. Any one or more of the said trustees, or of their successors herein, may at any time be removed, and their places filled, by a vote of the majority of the stock herein represented. All stockholders shall at once pay up all unpaid subscriptions owing to the company on the stock held by them. A meeting of the stockholders executing this agreement may be called by the trustees at any time upon —— days' notice, and shall be called by them upon like notice at any time, upon request of any three or more of the stockholders executing this agreement; and in all such meetings, a majority of the said stock being present in person, or by proxy, shall be a quorum; and any action taken by them shall be binding on all. This agreement shall be void if not executed by holders of the majority of all the stock of said company, but, when so executed, it shall be enforced and binding upon all who sign it for the period of five years from the date hereof, unless it be sooner determined and put an end to by a vote of the holders of two thirds of the stock represented herein. Upon the determination of this agreement, the trustees shall transfer to each of us the stock owned by us, respectively."

Messrs. Davidson & Jones for appellant.
Mr. Junius Davis for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At common law stockholders could not vote by proxy. Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222, 27 Am. Dec. 33, and other cases cited in Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 610. This is now otherwise, but it is still held that each stockholder, whether by himself or by proxy, must be free to cast his vote for what he deems for the best interest of the corporation, the other stockholders being entitled to the benefit of such free exercise of his judgment by each; and hence any combination or device by which any number of stockholders shall combine to place the voting of their shares in the irrevocable power of another is held contrary to public policy. Cone v. Russell, 48 N. J. Eq. 209. Various devices have been resorted to for the purpose of so tying up the stock that no one of the parties to the "pool" or combination can break the agreement. "Irrevocable" proxies to vote the stock have been given to a designated party, who acted as trustee or agent; but the courts held such proxies not irrevocable, and that they might be revoked at any time. Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp.

Law, §§ 610, 622; Woodruff v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 91; Vanderbilt v. Bennett, 2 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 409. Another plan was to place the stock of the various parties in the hands of trustees, with power to transfer the stock to themselves, and to hold and vote the same, trustee's certificates being issued to the various parties, specifying the amount of stock so deposited by them, and their interest in the pool; but the courts held that any holder of a trustee's certificate might at any time demand back his part of the stock. Woodruff v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. supra, and other cases cited in Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 622. Another device was that the parties contracted together not to sell their stock for a specified time, or only to a purchaser acceptable to them all. It was held that notwithstanding such contract, any one of the parties might sell his stock to any one he pleased, and at any time. Fisher v. Bush, 35 Hun, 642; Williams v. Montgomery, 68 Hun, 416. Another plan was to restrict by a by-law the right to transfer stock, but this was held illegal. Morgan v Struthers, 131 U. S. 246, 33 L. ed. 132, and other cases cited in Cook, Stock, Stockholders, & Corp. Law, § 332. A provision that a purchaser of a certificate of stock who sold in violation of the agreement should be entitled to the dividends, but should receive no right to vote, was likewise held invalid. Harper v. Raymond, 3 Bosw. 29. Numerous decisions affirm the correctness of the above rulings, which are based upon the illegality, because against public policy, of permitting large blocks of stock to be irrevocably tied up for the purpose of being voted in solido, for the interest of a clique or section of the stockholders and not according to the judgment of each individual stockholder, for the benefit of the entire corporation. There are some few decisions trenching more or less upon the principles above stated, but we deem them contrary to sound principles of public policy, and hence not authority. In short, all agreements and devices by which stockholders surrender their voting powers are invalid. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6404. The power to vote is inherently annexed to and inseparable from the real ownership of each share, and can only be delegated by proxy with power of revocation. The "pooling" arrangement admitted to have been entered into by the majority of stockholders in the present case is contrary to public policy and void (Woodruff v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. supra); and the plaintiff, assignee of certain of the trustee's certificates, is entitled to have his name entered as the owner and holder of the shares of stock represented by said trustee's certificates, and to have said shares issued to him, should the facts be found in accordance with his allegation, and to have the defendant restrained, till the hearing, from voting or controlling in any way the stock purchased by the plaintiff, or in any wise interfering with plaintiff's right to vote, control, or dispose of said stock.

1. An answer which is demurrable may be invulnerable when assailed by a motion to strike out.
2. An answer should not be stricken from the files if its meaning can be discovered and the facts alleged present a defense.
3. One whose name is indorsed on a note cannot be held liable thereon by a transferee if prior to the transfer he had given instructions for the erasure of his name, which was known to the transferee although the instructions were not complied with.
4. Parol evidence is admissible to show that prior to the transfer of a note an indorser from whom payment is demanded had, with the knowledge of the transferee, given instructions for the destruction of the indorsement.
5. An appeal on the judgment roll will present the question of the correctness of the granting of a motion to strike out an answer.

(April 27, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant Ryan from a judgment of the District Court for the Third Judicial District in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Anderson & Anderson, for appellant:

Gregg did not buy the indorsement of Ryan at all. He simply purchased the note without the indorsement, for the indorsement was to be erased, and for him to now claim that he has a contract of indorsement upon which Ryan should be held, because by the mistake and inadvertence of himself and Rasche the physical act of erasing Ryan's name was omitted to be done, although it was agreed that it should be done, is an attempt to perpetrate a fraud.

Where a party has knowledge of instructions limiting the authority of the agent such instructions are binding upon him.

Parol evidence is admissible to prove these things against a written instrument.

Messrs. Frank B. Stephens and Benner X. Smith, for respondent:

The appeal is taken on the judgment roll; there is no bill of exceptions whatever, the appeal is taken straight from the judgment. In order to review this question it would be necessary for appellant to have placed before the court a bill of exceptions containing the proceedings under the several motions.

King, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hyrum Groesbeck and Nicholas H. Groesbeck executed their promissory note in favor of Henry M. Ryan and Alexander Wood. Plaintiff, in his complaint, alleges that he purchased said note, after its indorsement by the payees and P. H. Rasche, for a valuable consideration, and before maturity, and that said indorsement was a part of the consideration inducing the purchase. Defendant Ryan filed a separate answer, the other defendants having defaulted, in which he averred that the defendant Rasche sold and transferred said note to plaintiff, but prior thereto the defendant Ryan specially ordered and instructed him, in case he should sell or transfer said note, that at or before making such transfer he should erase Ryan's name from the back, as an indorser; that Rasche expressly promised and agreed that he would do so, and would not transfer the note with Ryan's indorsement thereon; that, at the time of the sale and transfer of the note to the plaintiff, he was expressly informed of the agreement between Ryan and Rasche, and the said instructions given by the former to the latter; that the plaintiff then purchased and received said note understanding that the transfer was to be without recourse upon the defendant Ryan, and that the latter was not to be responsible as an indorser; and that the plaintiff purchased and took said note with this understanding and agreement. Defendant further avers that, owing to mistake and inadvertence of the plaintiff and Rasche, Ryan's name was not erased from the back of said note as was agreed and understood between them (plaintiff and Rasche). Plaintiff filed a motion to strike out the answer as sham, and for judgment on the pleadings, which was overruled. Afterwards he moved to set aside the order denying this motion, and for judgment on the pleadings, and upon this motion the court entered the following judgment: "It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the order of this court heretofore entered on the 17th day of February, 1894, overruling the plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, be set aside and vacated; that the answer of the defendant be stricken from the files as sham and frivolous. And it is further ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff do recover of the defendant Henry M. Ryan the sum of," etc.

The assignments of error relate to the action of the court in striking from the files defendant's answer, and present for determination the question of its efficiency as a defense. Respondent insists that, conceding the truth of the averments therein contained, no facts constituting a defense were presented, and no proof would be admissible under it, for the reason that it would tend to vary the terms of the written instrument upon which suit was brought. Appellant's contention is that the rule forbidding parol evidence to contradict written instruments has no application to this case.

The answer is very ambiguous and uncertain, and is clearly demurrable. There is some doubt as to the meaning of various allegations. But a demurrer is very different from a motion to strike a pleading from the files, although the practice is too often indulged in to substitute the latter for the former. An answer which may be subject to demurrer may be invulnerable when assailed by a motion to strike out. Upon a motion of this character the court is to be guided by the statute, which declares that, "in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations must be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice between the parties." 2 Comp. Laws, § 3228. Keeping in view this just statutory provision, let us ascertain what the answer means. In doing this it should be construed as a whole. Isolated sentences may convey an erroneous idea, and superfluous averments form no part of the pleading, and, upon a motion like that submitted in this case, may be disregarded, though they seem to be at variance with the material and substantial allegations therein. The meaning and intention of the pleader are the paramount considerations in determining the sufficiency of a pleading. Even if the meaning be obscure, and the language expressing it dark and uncertain, the court ought not to strike an answer from the files, if, by fair interpretation, the meaning can be discovered, and the facts alleged present a defense. While there are superfluous allegations in defendant's answer, and others are obscure, we think that, applying a just and liberal interpretation, the meaning of the defendant is obvious. It was to defend upon the ground that defendant Rasche was Ryan's agent, and as such was instructed by his principal (Ryan) to erase or destroy the latter's indorsement of the note prior to the sale, and the further ground that the plaintiff knew of this agency, and the instructions given to the agent, and purchased the note without the indorsement of the defendant. This, we think, is fairly deducible from the answer. Respondent contends that it contains no averments of agency, and that the only construction of which it is susceptible is that Ryan was not to be responsible as an indorser, but that the note was sold and transferred by Rasche with the indorsement thereon, and with the intention that it should remain, but with the understanding that the plaintiff took it without recourse upon Ryan. And one portion of the answer warrants this construction. But a consideration of the preceding allegations, and the one which follows, separated only by a semicolon, reveals the true meaning of the pleader. It is true that the answer contains no direct allegation of Rasche's agency, but it avers that instructions were given him. Agency may be well pleaded without employing the word "agent." But it is doubtful whether the question of agency is involved in this case. If Rasche were acting entirely for himself in vending the note, he had a right to erase Ryan's name prior to the sale; and if he were acting for appellant, and was instructed to destroy the indorsement before disposing of the note, it was his duty to do so. Placing the interpretation upon the answer which we think, in view of the motion, it was entitled to, the question is, Did it present any defense? With the general rule that indorsements in blank written on promissory notes constitute well defined contracts, and parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict, vary, or explain them, we fully concur. Respondent relies on the case of Martin v. Cole, 104 U. S. 30, 26 L. ed. 647, in support of his position that no defense was stated by the answer. A broad distinction exists between that case and the one now under consideration. Martin sold and transferred, by indorsement in blank, the promissory note of one Webb to Cole, who sued Martin on his indorsement. Martin alleged in his answer that at the time he indorsed the note to Cole there was an agreement that Martin should not be held liable on the indorsement, but that his name was written as an indorser solely to enable Cole to sue the maker in his own name, and that without such agreement he would not have signed his name on the back. Evidence in support of these averments was rejected. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this ruling. Martin intended to indorse the note, and transferred it intending that his name should be on the note. Under such circumstances the law closes his mouth, and forbids testimony of an oral contemporaneous agreement dehors the indorsement. But if his indorsement was there by mistake, or if, prior to the transfer of the note, he attempted to erase it, but failed, and disposed of the note under the belief that the erasure had been consummated, and the purchaser was cognizant of such facts, and took the note in view of them, an entirely different case would have been presented.

Respondent's counsel discuss the case at bar upon the hypothesis that appellant designed the note to be transferred accompanied by his indorsement, but with an agreement of nonliability as an indorser. If such had been the case their position would have been impregnable. If Ryan's instructions to Rasche were that the note should be sold with his name thereon as an indorser, but with the understanding that the indorsee should take it without recourse, then the case would come within the rule announced in Martin v. Cole, and he would have no standing in court. The question presented is not what the parties intended the indorsement to mean, or what they designed the legal effect to be, but whether, as between the appellant and respondent, the former's indorsement had any existence whatever; in other words, Did the plaintiff purchase the note with the defendant's name thereon? If he did not purchase defendant's indorsement, he cannot recover, and the answer states a valid defense. And whether the failure to erase defendant's name resulted from fraud, or the negligence or mistake of Rasche, it is immaterial. So long as the note was in defendant's possession or under his control, he had the right to destroy his indorsement. If he trusted his agent to erase it, and he omitted to do so, but transferred after fully advising the transferee of his instructions and the design of his principal, the purchaser takes the note without the indorsement, though the name appears thereon; and parol evidence is admissible, not to vary or contradict the indorsement, but to prove that there is no indorsement,—that the contract of indorsement was never consummated. A promissory note in the hands of the payee, or a holder with notice, may be shown by parol evidence to have been paid in full or in part. The written contract is not varied or changed, but it is shown not to have an existence, or that it has been wholly or partially annulled or destroyed as a contract. While not directly in point, the case of Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 228, 38 L. ed. 698, is in line with the views herein expressed. The court says: "In other words, according to the evidence offered and excluded, the written instrument, upon which this suit is based, was not,—except in a named contingency,—to become a contract, or a promissory note which the payee could at any time rightfully transfer. Evidence of such an oral agreement would show that the contingency never happened, and would not be in contradiction of the writing. It would prove that there never was any concluded, binding contract entitling the party who claimed the benefit of it to enforce its stipulations." And in the case at bar parol evidence offered under the answer would prove that no contract of indorsement was ever concluded. It would destroy the prima facie evidence of the existence of an indorsement, but would not vary or contradict it, and would be of like character as evidence tending to show the "contingency never happened. . . . Evidence to vary the terms of an agreement in writing is not admissible, but evidence to show that there is not an agreement at all is admissible." Pym v. Campbell, 6 El. & Bl. 370. Parol evidence is admissible to prove that an indorsement upon a promissory note is not a consummated contract, and to relieve the indorser, where the note had been converted by the plaintiff, after indorsement, and he had paid the indorser, who was payee, the face of the same. Haas v. Sackett, 40 Minn. 53, 2 L. R. A. 449. Suppose a principal should execute a bill of sale of an animal, leaving a blank for the vendee's name, and include therein a warranty, and place the instrument and animal in the hands of his agent to dispose of, and, prior to the sale, instructs his agent to erase from the instrument the portion containing the warranty, and to deliver the bill of sale to the purchaser of the animal, and the agent, before the sale, informs the vendee of his instructions, and they agree that the warranty shall be eliminated, but it is neglected, can it be contended that the principal would be liable on the warranty, and, if sued, could not produce parol evidence that it never was consummated as a contract between them,—in other words, to destroy it? Again, suppose the payee of a note, through mistake, should indorse it, and thereafter, in ignorance of the fact, sell it to a person who was likewise ignorant of the indorsement, and dealt with the payee, and purchased it, relying alone on the maker, and, upon discovering the indorsement, should bring suit against the indorser, could it be seriously contended that parol evidence offered to show the agreement between the parties, and the manner in which the name was placed upon the note, would be inadmissible? It is unnecessary to advert to the well-settled rules permitting parol evidence, in cases of fraud, mistake, etc., as this case presents a different question. We are of the opinion that it was error to strike the defendant's answer from the files.

But respondent contends, even if the court erred, its action cannot be reviewed by this court, for the reason that the appeal was taken on the judgment roll alone, and "its proceedings under the several motions are not presented." It would be a work of supererogation, in view of the wealth of learning found in the decisions of California and other states having a procedure act similar to ours, and of the lucid provision of our Code, to discuss the province of bills of exception and statements on appeal. Of course, this appeal is to be determined solely upon the questions presented by the judgment roll. The Code of Civil Procedure provides "that the pleadings, a copy of the verdict of the jury or findings of the court or referee, all bills of exceptions taken and filed, and a copy of the order made on demurrer, or relating to a change of parties and a copy of the judgment" shall constitute the judgment roll. 2 Comp. Laws, p. 300. And, though a pleading is striken from the files, it is still a part of the judgment roll. Abbott v. Douglass, 28 Cal. 299. And an order of the court striking out any pleading or rendering judgment is "deemed to have been excepted to." 2 Comp. Laws, p. 291. In this case the judgment recites that the former order of the court was vacated, and that the defendant's answer was striken from the files as sham and frivolous. The error complained of clearly appears in the judgment roll. In order to consider the alleged errors of the trial court, nothing need be brought into the record except that which is not supplied by the judgment roll. What was the necessity of a bill of exceptions? It would only duplicate the record already before the court. "The judgment roll itself is a record for appeal" (Wetherbee v. Carroll, 33 Cal. 553), and there is not only no necessity for further record, but it would be superfluous, and incumbering the record, to supply matters appearing in the roll. In the case of Zeile v. Moritz, 1 Utah, 285, a demurrer to the answer had been sustained, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The appeal was taken upon the judgment roll. The court says: "The judgment in this case discloses the action taken by the court on the demurrer. The recitals in it bring before us all the facts necessary to enable the court to determine whether there was error or not; that is the sufficiency of the answer. They accomplished all that could be accomplished by a statement." Errors in pleading can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll. Putnam v. Lamphier, 36 Cal. 158; Jones v. Petaluma, Id. 232; Smith v. Lawrence, 38 Cal. 28, 99 Am. Dec. 344. In the case last cited a demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and no exception taken. Upon appeal the court says, "Neither a bill of exceptions nor a statement is required, where the record already presents the question of law and the decision of the court. The case of Abbott v. Douglass, supra, cited by respondent's counsel, sustains the view we have announced. After witnesses had testified for plaintiff and defendants, the court "ordered that the answer of C. D. Douglass . . . be . . . stricken out; and that thereupon the default of said Doulgass be entered; and the plaintiff . . . have judgment against said defendant . . . for the sum of, etc. The appeal was taken from the judgment, and none of the grounds for striking out the answer were disclosed by the judgment roll. The court held, however, that the recitals in the judgment sufficiently indicated the errors complained of, and considered the case fully upon the merits of the pleadings, and held, among other things, that, the answer was not sham and frivolous, and reversed the case. The many cases collected in the respondent's brief, and relied on to vindicate his contention as to the abortiveness of the appeal, are clearly distinguishable from the case under consideration.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions that the defendant's answer be reinstated.

(148 N. Y. 463.)

1. A tenant in common of an oyster bed cannot deprive his cotenants of their right to take natural oysters therefrom by dredging the land and placing oyster shells and seed oysters thereon, although these must be slightly disturbed by taking the natural oysters.
2. An injunction will not be granted when it will operate inequitably or contrary to the real justice of the case.

(February 18, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Suffolk County Circuit in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass upon plaintiffs' oyster beds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. A. Spear, for appellants:

Injunction is a proper remedy in this action. Wright v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 49 Hun, 445, Affirmed 124 N. Y. 668; High, Inj. § 739.

Injunction will lie where a legal remedy is wholly inadequate.

Also to restrain a trespass where there is vexation from repeated or continued trespasses, and where the wrongful acts continued or threatened to be continued would occasion a multiplicity of suits to recover damages.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 1st day of July, 1891, a large portion of Great South Bay, in the county of Suffolk, N. Y., was owned by Helen T. and William S. Smith, the infant heirs of Robert R. Smith, and the town of Brookhaven, under its corporate name of the "Trustees of the Freeholders and Commonalty of the Town of Brookhaven," as tenants in common. The heirs of Robert R. Smith and the town of Brookhaven each owned an undivided one-half. The entire property contained about 40,000 acres of land under water, nearly all of which was suitable for oyster culture. Much of it was capable of nourishing and maturing oysters when planted upon it, and some of it, known as "oyster beds," produced spontaneously both marketable and seed oysters. The oyster beds were much the most valuable part of the land. On or about the day mentioned, Cornelia T. Smith, as widow of Robert R. Smith, and Cornelia T. Smith and Thomas S. Strong, as general guardians of Helen T. and William S. Smith, made a lease to the plaintiffs of about 70 acres of the land, for the purpose of planting, cultivating, and growing oysters thereon. The lease was for the term of ten years, at an annual rent of $175. The premises leased was an oyster bed known as the "Reef and Swash Bed." It was equaled in the quantity and quality of oysters it produced by but few beds in the bay. Its yield was, with few exceptions, regular each year, and comprised both seed and marketable oysters. The portion known as the "Reef" contained about 35 acres, and the "Swash" about the same. The lease purported to rent the whole of the 70 acres. In it the oysters planted or growing upon the premises were excepted from the covenant therein for the peaceable possession and enjoyment of the premises. Upon the delivery of the lease, the plaintiffs staked and buoyed the premises. During the season from the fall of 1891 to the spring of 1892, they permitted the baymen to go upon the beds, and take all the natural oysters they could obtain, and they took substantially all that could be taken at the time. In the spring of 1892, marketable oysters were growing thereon, and the usual amount was taken from the premises. In September of that year, seed and native marketable oysters of two and three years' growth were growing there to the usual extent. In June, 1892, the plaintiffs resurveyed the premises, reset the stakes and buoys thereon, and dredged the reef. In the latter part of that month, and early in July, the plaintiffs spread 1,100 bushels of shells and 100 bushels of Virginia seed oysters over the whole premises. The quantity of shells required to properly cover the premises for the propagation of oysters was 35,000 bushels. On September 1 there was a fine set of young oysters over the whole of the premises, which was largely the result of the plaintiffs' cultivation. The defendants, at the times hereinafter mentioned, were inhabitants of the town of Brookhaven; as such, were permitted by the town to take oysters from the premises; and all the defendants but Abram Smith were duly licensed by the town to take oysters from the undivided half of the land under water in the South Bay belonging to the town, for which they paid a license fee. Between the 1st and 19th of September, 1892, the defendants entered upon the premises leased to the plaintiffs, and took and disturbed, to a slight extent, the oysters that had been planted by the plaintiffs. All the oysters proved to have been taken by any of the defendants from the leased premises were marketable oysters of two or three years' growth, and it was impossible to gather the natural product from the premises without, to some extent, taking or disturbing the oysters planted by the plaintiffs. The defendants were men of small means, and unable to respond in damages to the plaintiffs. The town, for many years before this action, and up to the time of this trial, had purposely permitted the premises in question and other beds in South Bay to be used by the inhabitants of the town for taking seed and marketable oysters as a means of subsistence, and had refused to lease to any one the exclusive use of any of the oyster beds. When the lease to the plaintiffs was given, they had notice and full knowledge that it was given against the will of the town of Brookhaven. The oysters taken by the defendants up to September, 1892, were taken for market purposes. When the lease was given, the town was not cultivating the premises. The foregoing are substantially the facts found by the court.

As conclusions of law, the court held that the premises so leased were held and owned by the town of Brookhaven and the heirs of Robert R. Smith as tenants in common; that the lease to the plaintiffs was valid; that the plaintiffs possessed the rights in common in the property in question which the heirs of Robert R. Smith had, and the defendants possessed those which the town of Brookhaven had, and neither possessed any other nor different rights; that, under the lease, the plaintiffs had a right to take the natural oysters from the premises, but that neither of the cotenants could legally exclude the other from entry thereon or from taking the natural product thereof, that the planted oysters growing upon the premises between the 1st and 19th days of September, 1892, were the property of the plaintiffs, but that they could not legally prevent the defendants from entering upon the premises or from taking the natural growth of oysters thereon, and directed that the complaint be dismissed, with costs.

By this action the plaintiffs sought to enjoin the defendants from entering upon the premises, and taking or disturbing the oysters growing thereon, and to recover damages for such injury as they had sustained by reason of the acts of the defendants in disturbing the oysters planted by them. As there was no proof of the extent of any injury sustained by the plaintiffs, the action was in effect one for injunction. The findings of fact made by the learned trial judge and affirmed by the general term are fully sustained by the evidence, and therefore the question presented upon this appeal is whether, upon the facts as found, the court was justified in directing a judgment for the defendants.

Both parties admit that the relation which existed between them was that of tenants in common, and consequently there was a unity in their right of possession, as that is the very nature of the estate. The parties were tenants in common of the natural oysters, and the defendants, as such, had the same right as the plaintiffs to enter upon the premises and remove them. As to that, there is no dispute or controversy. But the appellants contend that, having dredged the land, and placed oyster shells and seed oysters upon it, they are entitled, not only to prevent the defendants from interfering with the oysters thus planted, but also to enjoin them from taking the natural ones, because in doing so they would, to a slight extent, disturb those planted by the plaintiffs. That the oysters taken by the defendants were chiefly of two or three years' growth, and therefore not the oysters planted by the plaintiffs, the court has found and the evidence establishes. The most that can be said is that the defendants, in removing the oysters as to which they were tenants in common, have slightly disturbed the oysters planted by the plaintiffs. The precise question presented is whether the plaintiffs could deprive the defendants of their right to take any of the natural oysters by scattering a few seed oysters over the premises in such a manner as to render it impossible to remove the natural ones without disturbing those planted. If they could not, then the decision of the courts below is right, and should be affirmed.

The appellants rely upon the case of Le Barron v. Babcock, 122 N. Y. 153, 9 L. R. A. 625. We find nothing in that case which upholds their claim. In the Le Barron Case the land was held by the plaintiff and the party represented by the defendant as tenants in common. The plaintiff was in peaceable possession, with the acquiescence of his cotenant. The oats and hay that were taken by the defendant had been severed from the freehold by the plaintiff, and were personal chattels. In that case it was said that when, in the due course of husbandry, the oats and hay were peaceably and in good faith severed from the common estate where they were grown, the title vested in the cotenant who had severed them. It was also said that, if the oats and hay were owned by the plaintiff and Mrs. House, it was not a conversion of them for the defendant, acting by her authority, to draw them away, and it was only upon the theory that the plaintiff owned them in his own right that the defendant was held liable. Neither the defendants nor their grantors ever acquiesced in the plaintiffs having any exclusive or other possession of this land, except such as they had as tenants in common with them. Nor were the oysters taken severed from the freehold by the plaintiffs, so that they became personal chattels. The land and the oysters thereon belonged to the tenants in common, and neither possessed any such title to the oysters, planted or natural, as would enable him to maintain an action for trespass or conversion against his cotenant for taking them from the land thus held in common. It is difficult to discover any principle which would justify a court of equity in restraining the defendants from taking the oysters which they had a right to remove, simply because in doing so some slight injury might result to those the plaintiffs had strewn over the lands. As the rights of tenants in common are equal in the use and enjoyment of the estate, it is a general rule that a court of equity will not interfere between them, even to restrain waste, unless it be of a malicious character, or so unusual and unreasonable as to constitute a wanton destruction of the estate. Freem. Cotenancy & Partition, § 323; High, Inj. § 692; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 735; Smith, Eq. 418. Another well-established rule of equity jurisprudence is that an injunction will not be granted when it will operate inequitably or contrary to the real justice of the case. Troy & B. R. Co. v. Boston, H. T. & W. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 107, 125.

In this case there is no evidence that the defendants' acts in removing the oysters which were the natural products of the land were malicious, unusual, or unreasonable, while it does show that, if an injunction was granted, it would operate inequitably and contrary to real justice by depriving the defendants of their admitted rights. There is nothing to show any disposition on the part of the defendants to unnecessarily interfere with or destroy the seed oysters planted by the plaintiffs. The only interference upon their part has been such as could not be avoided without an entire surrender of their rights to the use of the property.

Under these circumstances, we are clearly of the opinion that the trial court properly dismissed the plaintiffs' complaint upon the merits and that the judgment of the General Term should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

W. R. DAILEY et al., Petitioners,
v.
SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, Respt.

(.....Cal.....)

The production in a theater of a play based upon the facts of a criminal case then on trial, although it may interfere with the administration of justice and deprive the accused of a fair trial, and may constitute a punishable contempt, cannot be restrained by injunction, under Const. art. 1, § 9, declaring: "Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right."

(McFarland and Temple, JJ., dissent.)

(March 24, 1896.)

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review the action of respondent in directing petitioners to cease and refrain from giving a public performance of a certain play. Order annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Carroll Cook, for petitioners:

The order complained of was an attempt upon the part of the superior court to interfere with the rights guaranteed to petitioners by Cal. Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 9, 13, 14.

Every citizen has the absolute right unrestrained to express his sentiments upon any and all subjects, being responsible only for the abuse of that right.

The order is in violation of property rights protected by said Constitution.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 488, 1st ed. 417.

So far as the legislature could do so, it has by the positive letter of the law provided that such an act would not be in contempt of court and could not be made such by a court.

Haywood v. Collins, 60 Ill. 333; Kansas City,

NOTE.—The decision that an injunction cannot be granted to prevent an improper publication, even if it constitutes a punishable contempt of court and may interfere with the administration of justice by preventing a fair trial, which the court in the present case bases directly upon the constitutional declaration of a right freely to speak, write, and publish sentiments on all subjects, is believed to be without any direct precedent, although, as the opinion recites, the general understanding of constitutional writers seems to interpret that constitutional provision as a guaranty of a right to publish without any previous restraint or license. But several cases have sustained the right to an injunction against publication of false statements to injure property or business. These are referred to in the note to Flint v. Hutchinson Smoke Burner Co. (Mo.) 16 L. R. A. 243, but in none of these cases was this constitutional provision discussed. Considering the dissent of two of the judges in the above case, it is doubtful if the decision will be accepted unquestioningly as the true doctrine respecting the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech and the press. It may be considered certain that this constitutional guaranty is not limited to a freedom from censorship in advance of publication, and that it might easily be violated by laws attempting to punish persons for the expression of their honest sentiments on any subject. It may also be important to a proper interpretation of this constitutional guaranty to distinguish between "sentiments," which it declares may be freely expressed, and false statements of facts or obscene descriptions which involve no expression of sentiments. The court in the above case assumes that the theatrical representation involved a speaking of the "sentiments" of the author. Even if this is conceded, it would seem doubtful if the mere publication of a false statement of alleged fact involving no comment, criticism, or expression of opinion could be called a speaking of "sentiments," or come within this constitutional guaranty. Messrs. A. W. Thompson, William S. Barnes, John H. Dickinson, Eugene N. Deuprey, and Edgar D. Peixotto for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One Durrant was upon trial in the city of San Francisco, charged with murder, and while the jury was being impaneled, the petitioner, Dailey, advertised by posters and newspapers that he would produce in a certain theater in said city of San Francisco a play entitled "The Crime of a Century." Thereupon, Durrant presented an affidavit to the court wherein his trial was then pending, setting forth that said play was based upon the facts of his case as established at the preliminary examination and the coroner's inquest, and that the production of said play during the progress of his trial would be an interference with the administration of justice, and deprive him of a fair and impartial trial. The affidavit was full and complete as to details, but we see no purpose to be subserved by a further statement of the allegations therein set out. Upon the presentation of the affidavit the superior court made an order directing this petitioner, Dailey, to desist and refrain from giving any public performance of said play, and further ordered him to cease from advertising the same. The present proceeding is one of certiorari to review the action of the court in making the aforesaid order, it being insisted that the trial court thereby exceeded its power and jurisdiction. The record before us incidentally develops that this order was subsequently served upon the petitioner, that he defied the power of the court in making it, produced the play, and was adjudged guilty of contempt; but with those matters we are not now concerned.

The production of a tragedy or comedy upon the theatrical stage is a publication to the world by word of mouth of the text of the author, and, as to the question here presented for our consideration, it is immaterial whether the words be publicly spoken from the stage or upon the hustings, or go out to the world through the channels of the printing press. By the constitutional provision we are about to invoke, a citizen may speak, write, or publish his sentiments with equal freedom, and this case now stands before us exactly as though one of the daily journals was threatening to publish its sentiments pertaining to the conduct of a criminal trial then pending, and the court where such trial was pending and in progress, believing such publication would interfere with the due administration of justice, had issued an order restraining and prohibiting the threatened action of the paper. We are entirely clear that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order which forms the basis of this proceeding, for such order was an attempted infringement upon rights guaranteed to every citizen by § 9, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state. That section provides: "Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the use and abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." The wording of this section is terse and vigorous, and its meaning so plain that construction is not needed. The right of the citizen to freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments is unlimited, but he is responsible at the hands of the law for an abuse of that right. He shall have no censor over him to whom he must apply for permission to speak, write, or publish, but he shall be held accountable to the law for what he speaks, what he writes, and what he publishes. It is patent that this right to speak, write, and publish cannot be abused until it is exercised, and before it is exercised there can be no responsibility. The purpose of this provision of the Constitution was the abolishment of censorship, and for courts to act as censors is directly violative of that purpose. This provision of the Constitution as to freedom of speech varies somewhat from that of the Constitution of the United States, and also more or less from the provisions of many state Constitutions treating of this question; but, if there is a material difference in the various provisions, it works no harm to this petitioner, for the provision here considered is the broader, and gives him greater liberty in the exercise of the right granted. The meaning of this provision, or others of similar import, has been declared with unanimity by all commentators upon the law. Blackstone declares that the liberty of the press consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matters when published. He says: "Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press. But if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licensor, as was formerly done before and since the Revolution of 1688, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. . . . Thus the will of individuals is still left free. The abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment." Story, in his work upon the Constitution, (§ 1885) declares: "Indeed, the liberty of the press, as understood by all England, is the right to publish without any previous restraint, or license; so that neither the courts of justice, nor other persons, are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press, but are confined to those which are printed." De Lolme, in his Constitution of England (page 872), declares: "Liberty of the press consists in this: that neither courts of justice nor any other judges whatever are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press, but are confined to those which are actually printed." In Ex parte Barry, 85 Cal. 607, the foregoing doctrine is reiterated and approved.

It would seem that the jurisdiction here attempted to be exercised would essentially belong to a court of equity. Yet, even if this proceeding for a restraining order had been inaugurated in such a forum, it would have signally failed. In Story, Eq. Jur. § 948*a*, the author says: "But the utmost extent to which courts of equity have gone in restraining any publication by injunction has been upon the principle of protecting the rights of property in the book or letters sought to be published. They have never assumed, at least since the destruction of the court of star chamber, to restrain any publication which purports to be a literary work upon the mere ground that it is of a libelous character, and tends to the degradation or injury of the reputation or business of the plaintiff who seeks relief against such publication." And this principle was declared by the learned chancellor in Brandreth v. Lance, 8 Paige, 26, 34 Am. Dec. 368, wherein he said: "It is very evident that this court cannot assume jurisdiction of the case presented by the complainant's bill, or of any other case of the like nature, without infringing upon the liberty of the press, and attempting to exercise a power of preventive justice which, as the legislature has decided, cannot safely be intrusted to any tribunal, consistently with the principles of a free government." After referring to the court of star chamber, he proceeds: "Since that court was abolished, however, I believe there is but one case upon record in which any court, either in this country or in England, has attempted, by an injunction or order of the court, to prohibit or restrain the publication of a libel, as such, in anticipation." In effect, the order made by the trial court in this case was one commanding the petitioner not to commit a contempt of court, and such a practice is novel in the extreme. The court had ample power to protect itself in the administration of justice after the contempt was committed. As to the offender, it could punish him; as to the defendant on trial, he could be deprived of no rights by any act of this petitioner. If the publication deprived him of a fair and impartial trial at that time, a second trial would have been awarded him.

We conclude that the order made by the trial court was an attempted restraint upon the right of free speech, as guaranteed by the Constitution of this state, and that petitioner's mouth could not be closed in advance for the purpose of preventing an utterance of his sentiments, however mischievous the prospective results of such utterance. He had the right of free speech, but at all times was responsible to the law for an abuse of that right.

For the foregoing reasons, the order is annulled, as being beyond the power of the court to make.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent. All the provisions of the Constitution must be construed together, and effect given, when possible, to each. The one section (9) of article 1, which provides that "every citizen may freely speak," etc., is to be construed in view of that large and important part of the Constitution by which a judicial department of the government is created, and all the usual and necessary powers of courts given to the tribunals established under it. One of the most essential of these powers of a court is to protect itself against unlawful intrusion upon its orderly conduct of business, and to insure litigants in a pending proceeding the free and unembarrassed administration of justice. In the case at bar, in a court of record established by the Constitution, a trial was gravely progressing in which a man's life was at stake, and an act was about to be done which it is admitted "would be an interference with the administration of justice, and deprive him of a fair and impartial trial." Is it possible that a court is powerless to protect a defendant in a case pending before it from an act that would deprive him of a fair and impartial trial? In my opinion the right given by section 9 of article 1 not to be stopped beforehand from speaking slanders and writing libels, does not include the right not to be stopped from interfering with a pending proceeding in a court, and preventing a party thereto from having a fair and impartial trial. The right to slander and libel individuals, and the right of a court to prevent interference with the course of justice in a pending trial, are not inconsistent and may both stand together. And I think that the cases where it has been held that a threatened publication could not be enjoined will be found to be nearly all cases of threatened libels against individuals or property, and not cases where there was a threatened interference with a pending proceeding in a court, and an attempt to deprive a party thereto of a fair and impartial trial. I think that the order under review should be affirmed.

I concur: Temple, J.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CINCINNATI STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v. Charles B. SNELL.

(.....Ohio.....)

1. The introduction of new forms of vehicles, and of new motive power on street railways, has not impaired the right of the foot passenger to safe passage at street crossings. It is the duty of drivers of vehicles, whether wagons, wheels, or cars, to so regulate the speed thereof, and give such warning of approach, at whatever cost of pains and trouble on their part, as that the footman, using ordinary care himself, may, in the absence of unavoidable accident, cross in safety.

2. When a street-railway company operating a double-track road discharges a passenger at a street crossing, having reason to know that such passenger, in order to reach his destination, must cross its tracks, it is the duty of such company to regard the rights of the passenger while on the crossing, and to so control the speed of cars on its tracks, and give such warning of their approach, as will reasonably protect the passenger from injury. Omission of such duty is negligence, and a person injured by reason thereof may maintain an action against the company for damages unless prevented by his own negligence contributing to the injury.

3. A person about to cross the track of a street railway at a street crossing is bound to exercise care proportioned to the danger to be avoided and the consequences which might result from want of it, conforming in amount and degree to the particular circumstances surrounding him; but it is only ordinary care which is required, that which might reasonably be expected of persons of ordinary prudence. Ordinary care does not require him to anticipate negligence on the part of those operating the railway. And while he should use his faculties for his own protection, it is not negligence per se for him to omit to look in both directions for the approach of a car. Whether it is or is not negligence depends upon the circumstances.

4. Where the evidence of the plaintiff shows actionable negligence on the part of the company, and the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff depends upon a variety of circumstances from which different minds may reasonably arrive at different conclusions as to whether there was contributory negligence or not, the question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions; and it is error in such case for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant.

5. And where in such case the question as to whether or not the plaintiff exercised his faculties of seeing and hearing before attempting to cross is in issue, and the oral evidence tends to show that he did, while circumstantial evidence tends to disprove that claim, a condition is presented involving such variety of circumstances as makes it proper to submit the question to the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment reversing a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

Action below was by Snell against the street railway company, to recover for personal injuries received by being struck by a moving car of the company. In the common pleas, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, a motion by the company to direct a verdict in its favor was sustained, and a judgment on the verdict so rendered was entered. This judgment was reversed by the circuit court. The company asks a reversal of that judgment.

Messrs. Paxton, Warrington, & Boutet, Kittredge & Wilby, for plaintiff in error:

Obstructions to the view of a person about to cross a track, instead of furnishing an excuse, impose greater care, and this, too, at regular crossings where persons have a right to cross the tracks.

Messrs. John W. Wolfe and Thomas L. Michie, for defendant in error:

Stepping on to the track of a street railway, whether the cars thereon are horse cars or grip cars, without first stopping to look to see whether a car is approaching, is not, as matter of law, and without any regard to surrounding circumstances, negligence, but the character of such action is a question of fact for the jury. Running street cars at rapid speed (although

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ground upon which the common pleas directed a verdict was that the plaintiff's evidence disclosed contributory negligence of such a character as to preclude a recovery. In other words, the holding was that, as matter of law, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. If the plaintiff's conduct, as shown by the undisputed facts, left no rational inference but that of negligence, then the ruling was right, but if the question of contributory negligence depended upon a variety of circumstances from which different minds might arrive at different conclusions as to whether there was negligence or not, then the ruling was wrong. This follows from the rule given in Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610. Applying the doctrine of that case, the motion involved an admission of all the facts which the evidence in any degree tended to prove, and presented only a question of law, whether each fact indispensable to the right of action, and put in issue by the pleadings, had been supported by some evidence. If it had been, no matter how slight the evidence, the motion should have been denied, because it was the right of the plaintiff to have the weight and sufficiency of his evidence passed upon by the jury. But if he had failed to give evidence tending to establish any fact without which the law would not permit a recovery, he had nothing to submit to the jury, and a question of law only remained. We are aware that this rule is much criticised, and plausible arguments against its reasonableness have been adduced, but it has been followed uniformly, and should be applied until definitely overruled, or changed by legislation.

The plaintiff was himself bound to use ordinary care, such degree of care as men of ordinary prudence commonly use under like circumstances; care proportioned to the danger to be avoided, and the consequence which might result from want of it, conforming in amount and degree to the particular circumstances under which it was to be exercised. If all people exercised the greatest possible caution in approaching and crossing railroad tracks accidents would be much less frequent than they are; but the law does not require extreme care. Such care, and such only, as ordinarily prudent persons could reasonably be expected to exercise under the circumstances is the full measure. In order, therefore, to judge whether or not a fair question was presented regarding plaintiff's contributory negligence, we must inquire into the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence he introduced.

The evidence showed that the company's road is operated on Eastern avenue, Cincinnati, a thoroughfare running east and west. It is a double-track electric road, the space between the tracks being about 3 feet. The cars are wider than the track, extending about 1 foot outside the rail. Defendant in error, Snell, resided on the north side of the avenue, between Washington and Weeks streets, the block between these streets being about 800 feet in length. Near his residence, in front of a drug store, there was a flag-stone street crosswalk at which the cars were accustomed to stop to receive and discharge passengers Snell had been a daily passenger on the road for a number of years, and was known, as also his residence and place of getting on and off, to the railroad conductors. On the day of the accident Snell was a passenger on an east-bound car on the south track. As the car approached the crossing the speed was slackened to allow Snell to get off, but did not quite stop. He stepped off outside of the south track at the crossing, and turned north to go to the north side of the street, which required him to cross both tracks. As he neared the south rail of the north track he was struck by a west-bound car and injured.

The evidence tends to show further that Snell had not observed the coming car before alighting, nor does it appear that he looked, while in the car, in the direction from which the other car was approaching. At some time, while crossing, he looked both east and west along the track, but the precise point from which he looked east is not clear. The conductor of the car on which he had ridden gave him no warning of the approaching car, nor was any gong, or other alarm sounded, or warning given, by the motorman in charge of the coming car. He was inexperienced, having been the driver of a milk wagon until two or three days before. On the same car there was an experienced motorman, who was on for the purpose of giving the new hand instruction. At the moment Snell was struck the car was running about 20 miles an hour, on down grade, and ran about 100 feet before it could be stopped. The car from which Snell alighted was moving slowly east, and had the other car been running at an ordinary rate of speed Snell would probably have had, after he saw it, opportunity to avoid it, but the car moved so rapidly that, after seeing it, he had but time to throw up his hands and try to step back when the car struck him.

The question presented for the court was, simply, Did the evidence establish, as matter of law, that Snell was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury? The place of the accident was a street crossing, used as such by the public, and recognized as such by the company. It was the duty of the company to keep in mind the right of pedestrians on that crossing, and especially its duty to observe the rights of its own patrons who were under a necessity of using that crossing in going from its cars to their houses. Ancient rights have not changed because new vehicles of travel have been introduced upon the streets, nor because a portion of the people who ride, being in haste to reach their destination, demand rapid transit. The streets remain for all the people, and he who goes afoot has the right, especially at a crossing, to walk to his destination; he should not be compelled to run, or to dodge and scramble to avoid collision with vehicles. As a general proposition, drivers of vehicles have the same right to travel along the carriageway of a street that foot passengers have to walk there. There is no priority of right; so that the right of neither is exclusive. But it is to be borne in mind that the injury by collision is wholly upon the side of the footman; and the right of personal protection which every person possesses, together with that moral and legal obligation to refrain from doing an injury to his person which is imposed upon all others, gives the foot passenger such a right at street crossings as to make it the duty of drivers of vehicles, whether wagons, wheels, or cars, to so regulate their speed, and give such warning of approach, at whatever cost of pains and trouble on their part, as that the footman, using ordinary care himself and barring inevitable accident, may cross in safety. Life and limb are of more consequence than quick transit. The vehicle man must not run down the pedestrian. The opposite doctrine appears to have found lodgment in many minds, and there seems a disposition to assume that a foot passenger has no right upon a public street as against a street car. Indeed, common observation seems to show that this belief controls the conduct of drivers of many conveyances, public and private. Too often there is a reckless disregard of human life and limb, and pedestrians are compelled, at their peril, to keep out of the way. As matter of law, it is as much the duty of the vehicle to keep out of the way of the footman, and especially so at crossings, as it is for the latter to escape being run over, giving due consideration to the greater difficulty of guiding and arresting the progress of the vehicle. The use of streets for railways is allowed only because it is considered not to be a substantial interference with their free and unobstructed use as highways for passage. So long, therefore, as there is no unreasonable interference with the public right of passage, railways in streets are lawful structures; but if operated upon the theory of exclusive right to their track, they become wrongdoers. Cincinnati & S. G. Ave. Street R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 523; Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 267, 36 Am. Rep. 542; Baxter v. Second Ave. R. Co. 3 Robt. 516; Barker v. Savage, 1 Sweeney, 288; Newark Pass. R. Co. v. Block, 55 N. J. L. 605, 22 L. R. A. 378; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264.

Undoubtedly the footman must reasonably use his senses for his own protection, and if he knows of the approach of a vehicle, and, using his faculties, perceives that he cannot continue on without danger of collision, he may not rush forward regardless of consequences. He is not bound, however, to anticipate negligence on the part of drivers of vehicles, but has the right to assume that they will not be negligent.

In this case, if the evidence was to be believed, there was a total disregard of plaintiff's rights, a clear case of gross, culpable negligence. The company owed to the passenger who had just alighted the duty of permitting him to cross from its car to the opposite side of the street without peril of life or limb from the acts of the company; instead of which it sent its car down the grade at break neck speed without giving any warning, or taking any pains to avoid running him down. Snell, it is true, was bound to anticipate that a car might come on the north track, but he was not required to anticipate that it would come at such a dangerous rate of speed, for that would be presuming that the company would be negligent, and if, acting on the presumption that the company would not be negligent, he used such caution as men of ordinary prudence would have used, his own conduct did not preclude a recovery. Whether he did use such degree of care, we think, was a question for the jury. The evidence presented a case where different minds might reasonably reach different conclusions. We are not required to determine the question whether or not Snell was negligent.

It is insisted that in the best view of the case for the plaintiff, the evidence shows that he did not look to the east, for while it may be that the verbal evidence tends to show that he did look in that direction, yet he could not have done so for if he had he surely would have seen the coming car, and that as a matter of law, it is negligence for one about to cross a railway not to look each way. Authorities are to be found giving apparent support to this proposition. The practice in some courts is for the court to direct a verdict whenever, in the opinion of the judge, the evidence would not warrant a judgment. And some of these decisions imply that the court has held persons about to cross a street-car track to the same degree of care as would be demanded were he crossing a steam railroad. We think there is no just analogy between the right of a street railway running cars along a highway and the right of a steam railroad running its trains across a highway at grade, and that the rule of care incumbent upon one about to cross a steam railroad is hardly a fair one to be applied in all its strictness to street railways in cities where a car that can be speedily stopped passes a crossing at frequent intervals, and where people necessarily cross the streets frequently and hurriedly. As remarked by Gray, Ch. J., in Lyman v. Union R. Co. 114 Mass. 88: "The cases relating to injuries suffered by being struck by a locomotive engine at a railroad crossing afforded no test of the degree of care required of the plaintiff in this case. The cars of the horse railway have not the same right to the use of the track over which they travel, do not run at the same speed, are not attended with the same danger, and are not so difficult to check quickly and suddenly, as those of an ordinary railroad corporation. A person lawfully traveling upon the highway is not therefore bound to exercise the same degree of watchfulness and attention to avoid the one as to keep himself out of the way of the other." Other cases in Massachusetts are to the effect that the fact that plaintiff's evidence does not show that he looked up and down the street before crossing is not, as matter of law, conclusive evidence that he was not in the exercise of due care, and that the mere fact of not looking when one attempts to cross a railroad is not conclusive evidence of want of care. Williams v. Grealy, 112 Mass. 82; Bowser v. Wellington, 126 Mass. 391; Shapleigh v. Wyman, 134 Mass. 118. Whether such omission is or is not negligence depends upon the circumstances. Newark Pass. R. Co. v. Block, supra; Chicago City R. Co. v. Robinson, 127 Ill. 9, 4 L. R. A. 126; Omaha Street R. Co. v. Loehneisen, 40 Neb. 37; Shea v. Potrero & B. V. R. Co. 44 Cal. 414; Swain v. Fourteenth Street R. Co. 93 Cal. 179; Driscoll v. Market Street Cable R. Co. 97 Cal. 553; Thomp. Neg. 396, note.

We suppose the rule for street cars is the same as for other vehicles, and if the footman is required, in a crowded thoroughfare, to look up and down and wait until all possibility of collision is past, it would be like sitting on the bank until the stream should run by, and there would be but few hours in the busy part of the day when it would be practicable to cross.

Whether looking eastward would have disclosed the coming car depends upon whether the receding car would have obstructed the view, and this depends upon its location at the time Snell looked, if he did look. The evidence is consistent with the conclusion that he looked up the track, but that the receding car prevented him from seeing the approaching one, and that, as the former made some noise, his attention was not called to the rumbling of the latter. And it is not inconsistent with the conclusion that ordinary range of vision would probably have enabled him without turning his head or eyes up the track, to see a car in time to avoid it had the car been running at a safe rate of speed, and we think one so crossing could not be asked to extend his observation beyond that distance within which a car proceeding at a customary and reasonably safe speed would threaten his safety.

Taking the effect of the evidence as a whole, one thing which is tolerably clear is that if the car had been running at a reasonable rate of speed, and proper warning had been given, Snell would not have been injured; all else is in more or less doubt. The evidence pro and con. therefore, was to be weighed, and the tribunal for that purpose was the jury, not the court upon the motion.

The judgment of reversal was, we think, right, and the same is affirmed.

Shauck, J., dissenting:

The case upon which the trial judge gave a conclusive direction to the jury, taking the view most favorable to the plaintiff that the evidence would permit, was that his senses of sight and hearing were normal, that he knew he was upon a double-track electric railway, that he quit a car and immediately passed to its rear toward the other track without looking in the direction from which the colliding car came, and was struck and injured by a car approaching at a rate of speed which, under the circumstances, was dangerous, and that he had no knowledge of its approach The negligence of the defendant is conceded, and the material inquiry relates to the conduct of the plaintiff. The degree or character of the defendant's negligence cannot be material, if, by due care on the part of plaintiff, the injury would have been avoided.

Upon this subject it is said in the principal opinion: "Undoubtedly the footman must reasonably use his senses for his own protection, and if he knows of the approach of a vehicle, and, using his faculties, perceives that he cannot continue on without danger of collision, he may not rush forward regardless of consequences." If this means that under such circumstances the footman is required to use his senses of sight and hearing to ascertain whether a car is approaching upon the track which he is about to cross, it is a correct statement of the law and a full justification of the direction given to the jury. If, however, it means that nothing is required of him except to act rationally in view of dangers that may be threatened from a car of whose approach he may happen to know, it defines a rule which, in view of the difficulty in proving his knowledge, is incapable of practical application, and which is in conflict with the adjudicated cases and the established principles of the law of negligence.

Some of those principles are accurately though generally stated in the foregoing syllabus and opinion. But the law, keeping pace with the progress of society, has, from those general principles, deduced definite rules of conduct, applicable to situations which arise frequently. Such a rule was defined by this court in Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Crawford, 24 Ohio St. 631, by which it is made the imperative duty of "a person in the full enjoyment of the faculties of hearing and seeing before attempting to pass over a known railroad crossing should use them for the purpose of discovering and avoiding danger from an approaching train; and the omission to do so, without a reasonable excuse therefor is negligence, and will defeat an action by such person for an injury to which such negligence contributed." That rule has been affirmed in very many cases, among which are Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Elliott, 28 Ohio St. 340; Pennsylvania Co. v. Rathgeb, 32 Ohio St. 66; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v Whitacre, 35 Ohio St. 627. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Rathgeb the general rules were correctly given to the jury, but the judgment of the trial court was reversed by this court because there was not given the definite and particular rule which the trial judge applied in this case.

Neither the authorities nor the reasons involved will permit a distinction between steam cars on the one hand and electric and cable cars on the other as to the application of this rule. Bailey v. Market Street Cable R. Co (Cal.) 42 Pac. 914; Buzby v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 126 Pa. 559; Ward v. Rochester Electric R. Co.

43 N. Y. S. R. 84; Fritz v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. (Mich.) 62 N. W. 1007; Boerth v. West Side R. Co. 87 Wis. 288. The distinction is not encouraged by the decisions of the supreme court of Massachusetts, cited in the majority opinion. They relate to horse cars which are likened to ordinary vehicles because of their low speed, and the ease with which they may be stopped.

It is true that the introduction of a new motive power for the purpose of rapid transit has not changed the relative rights and duties of carriers and footmen. It is equally true that it imposes upon carriers and footmen alike the duty of exercising greater absolute care. This is true because the rules of relative care have not changed, the carrier is required to use greater care because of the increased speed of its cars and their greater weight, and the footman must use greater care because of his knowledge that he is lawfully exposed to greater danger.

There are considerations of great importance which cannot be eliminated from cases of this character. The car cannot be stopped instantly, nor can it be turned from its track. The footman can instantly stop or change his course. Considerations of health and economy require that the populations of large cities occupy extended territories, whence arises the necessity for rapid transit. Transit cannot be rapid as to those aboard the cars and slow as to those crossing the street. The same considerations require that there shall be low fares. From the fact that these carriers have no mysterious sources of revenue, it results that compensation awarded to the careless, though in form of a judgment against the carrier, must be ultimately paid by its careful patrons. The whole duty of the public in this regard is performed when they compensate those who, while in the exercise of due care, are injured by the carelessness of the agencies which public necessities have called into existence. In view of these and like considerations, I am not willing to seem to believe that it is practicable either to protect those who go upon the crowded streets of cities with slumbering senses, or to compensate them for injuries to which a failure to use their senses contributes.

The course of the trial judge in this case is worthy of commendation. Having devoted enough time to the orderly examination of the case to disclose a conclusive reason why the plaintiff could not recover a verdict according to law, he directed the verdict which the law required. The plaintiff had no constitutional or legal right to recover a verdict upon which he could not recover a judgment. Had the case been submitted to the jury upon general instructions, the court would not have been sitting to administer justice, but to experiment with a verdict. Such a course was required by no right of the plaintiff. It was forbidden by justice to the defendant and by a due regard for the rights of the public in a speedy administration of justice.

v.
SOUTHERN NEW ENGLAND TELEPHONE COMPANY, Appt.

(66 Conn. 539.)

Power of selectmen to cut and trim trees overhanging a highway without the consent of the owner, for the purpose of compelling a change in the location of telegraph or telephone wires, is denied by Gen. Stat. § 3944, prohibiting telegraph or telephone companies to injure any tree without the consent of the owner.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this case alleges that the defendant wrongfully entered upon the land of the plaintiffs, and cut and trimmed six trees growing thereon. The defendant filed three answers; the first being a general denial, and the second and third setting up certain facts in justification of the trespass charged. The case was tried to the jury. There was a verdict for the plaintiffs, and from the judgment upon the verdict the present appeal is brought.

The facts upon which the questions raised by the appeal depend may be stated as follows: The land on which the trees stood is bounded on a public highway, and it lies partly in New Haven and partly in East Haven. The six trees in question stood just within the fence line adjoining the highway,—four of them being on the New Haven part of the land, and two of them on the East Haven part,—and their branches, to some extent, overhung the highway. The defendant is a corporation created by the legislature of this state, and authorized by its charter to construct and maintain telephone lines, including poles, wires, and necessary fixtures, upon any highway of this state. It had, before the date of the alleged trespass, constructed a telephone line along the east side of the highway which bounded the plaintiffs land, and was then operating the same. On the 22d of May, 1894, the selectmen of East Haven issued the following document to the defendant: "Whereas, in the construction of the line of the New Haven Street-Railway Company, certain telephone poles and wires interfere with the running and operation of the electrical conductors and cars of said company, and it is necessary that said telephone poles and wires should be removed and relocated: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, selectmen of the town of East Haven, having, under the statutes of the state, direction and control over the placing, removal, and relocation of structures upon the highways of towns, for the purpose of securing a proper construction of such railway, hereby order, direct, and permit the removal and relocation by the Southern New England Telephone Company of sundry telephone poles and wires now located upon the layout of said railroad in said town of East Haven, and to trim such trees upon said highway as may be necessary for a distance of 1 foot from the outside wire of said line, according to the diagram hereto attached, and in accordance with the following detail, to wit: On the west side of Main street from the town line southeasterly to road known as 'Horse-Cart Way,' first north of townhall." On the same day the selectmen of New Haven issued to the defendant a document in substantially the same language respecting that part of the defendant's telephone line in New Haven which it was deemed necessary to change in the construction of the railway. Under these documents the defendant removed its line of poles, then standing on the east side of the highway aforesaid, to the west side of the same, and relocated its poles along said west side at the points designated by the selectmen. In so doing, some of them were placed in the highway adjoining the plaintiffs' premises, and, to permit the erection of the defendant's poles and wires at this point, the defendant cut and trimmed the six trees in question. In its second answer the defendant justified under these two documents issued by the selectmen as aforesaid. In its third answer it justified on the ground, in substance, that the parts of said trees cut and trimmed off were an obstruction and a nuisance to the public, in the use of the highway, and more especially to the defendant, in the construction and erection of its poles and wires at this point.

The controlling question in the case relates to the power of the selectmen, under the circumstances, to authorize the cutting and trimming of these trees; for, if they possessed such a power, then the facts set up in the second answer, if true, would be a complete justification, independently of the other facts set up in the third answer, and, if they did not possess it, then we think the defendant could not justify under the other facts set up in the third answer, for the reasons hereinafter stated. As this power, if it existed at all in the selectmen, was given to them by statute, it will be necessary to examine the statutes under which it is, or may be, fairly claimed such power was conferred; and, in connection with that examination it will simplify matters, perhaps, to look first at the statutes which prohibit the cutting and injuring of trees, without the consent of the owner, by companies who are authorized to maintain electrical wires or fixtures of any kind on the public highways. The statute under which the defendant in June, 1894, maintained its telephone line upon the highway in question, reads as follows: "Every telegraph or telephone company may maintain and construct lines of telegraph or telephone upon any highway, or across any waters in this state, by the maintenance and erection of the necessary fixtures, including posts, piers, or abutments for sustaining wires; but the same shall not be so constructed as to incommode public travel or navigation, nor to injure any tree without the consent of the owner." Gen. Stat. § 3944. The prohibition contained in this section, against injuring trees without the consent of the owner, was first passed in 1860. Pub. Acts 1860, chap. 66. And it has remained upon the statute book ever since. In addition to this prohibition, § 1477 of the General Statutes provides that every person who shall wilfully injure any tree in a highway "for any purpose connected with the erection or maintenance of any telegraph, telephone, or electric light or power, wires or fixtures, without the consent of the adjoining proprietor," shall be subject to fine and imprisonment; and § 1759 provides that "no telegraph, telephone, or electric light or power company shall cause to be cut down or injured any tree growing on the highway, for the purpose of constructing or maintaining any electrical wires or fixtures of any kind without the written consent of the adjoining proprietor," under penalty of a fine, and, in default of payment, imprisonment. Under these provisions, it is quite clear that the defendant upon its own authority, could not lawfully injure the trees in question, without the consent of the plaintiffs, either for the purpose of locating its line at this point originally, or of shifting and changing part of its line to this point from some other where it had been originally placed; and, indeed, the defendant makes no claim of this kind. What it does claim is that the selectmen had the power to compel it to change the location of its wires as ordered, and, as incidental to this, had the power to cut and trim the trees in question, which power to cut and trim the selectmen could and did delegate to it.

Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that the selectmen could and did delegate such power to the defendant, if they possessed it, the important question is, Did they themselves possess it? Section 3945 of the General Statutes provides that no telephone company, "nor any company or association engaged in distributing electricity by wires or similar conductors, or in using an electric wire or conductor for any purpose, may hereafter exercise any of the powers which may have been conferred upon it to erect or place wires, conductors, fixtures, structures, or apparatus of any kind over, on, or under any highway or public ground or to change the location of the same, without the consent of the adjoining proprietors, or, in case such consent cannot be obtained, without the consent in writing of two of the county commissioners of the county in which it is desired to exercise said powers." The next section (3946) provides that the selectmen in their towns, but not in the cities or boroughs, shall, subject to the provisions of the preceding section, "have full direction and control over the placing, erection, and maintenance of any such wires, conductors, fixtures, structures, or apparatus, including the relocating or removal of the same. . . . and may make all orders necessary to the exercise of such power of direction and control," etc. Section 2 of chapter 169 of the Public Acts of 1893, so far as it is applicable to towns alone, provides that before any street railway company shall proceed to construct its railway, or lay additional tracks, or change its motive power, in a town, it shall cause a plan thereof to be made, as prescribed in said section, and presented to the selectmen of such town for their acceptance and adoption, either as originally made, or as modified after a hearing had thereon. Section 3 of the same act provides that the selectmen shall have "exclusive direction over the placing, or locating of any tracks, wires, conductors, fixtures, structures of any such railway permanently located in the streets or highways, including the relocating or removal of the same, or changes in the grade thereof, and for the purpose of any public improvement and including the power of designating the material, quality, and finish thereof, may make all orders necessary to the exercise of such power of direction and control, which orders shall be in writing," etc. Under this act of 1893 the street-railway company mentioned in the record made a plan as prescribed by the act, and presented it to the selectmen of New Haven and of East Haven, who accepted and adopted it. It was for the purpose of enabling said street-railway company to build its road according to said plan that the selectmen of both towns issued the two documents to the defendant under which it attempts to justify the cutting and trimming of the trees in question, in its second answer. If we assume, for the sake of the argument, that the selectmen had the power, under § 3946 of the General Statutes, or under § 3 of the act of 1893, or under both, to order the defendant to remove and relocate its poles and wires for the purpose indicated in said documents, the question still remains whether they, in order to accomplish this purpose, had the power to injure these trees without the consent of the plaintiffs, and we think they had not. The power given to them by § 3946, to direct where the poles and wires of a telephone company shall be placed at the time of the original location of the line, is, we think, given to them subject to the prohibitions not to injure trees without the consent of the owner, contained in §§ 1477, 1759, and 3944 of the General Statutes, already quoted. Section 3946 does not repeal these other sections expressly, nor do we think it does so by implication. They all may well stand together, and, if this be true as to an original location we think it equally true of a relocation, as here. Nor do we think that the powers of the selectmen are enlarged in this respect by the act of 1893. That act does not purport to enlarge in any way the powers of selectmen over telephone companies. Neither does it expressly, or by any necessary implication repeal the sections of the General Statutes aforesaid, prohibiting injury to trees without the owner's consent. We see no necessary inconsistency between those sections and the act of 1893, and they may well stand together. This construction gives due force and effect to all the statutes in question, and, as it seems to us, is the only one which can be put upon them as a whole. If any insuperable difficulty arises from this construction, the remedy must be furnished by the legislature, and not by the courts. At present, however, we do not well see how any such difficulty can arise. Our conclusion is that the selectmen had no power, without the plaintiffs' consent, to cut or trim the trees in question, to enable the telephone company to erect or operate its line in the new location; and consequently they did not, and could not, delegate that power to the defendant. In this view of the matter, the rulings of the court upon the evidence, and its charge to the jury upon the defense made by and under the second answer, as they appear of record, were correct.

Under its third answer the defendant's claim, in substance, was that the branches cut were an obstruction and a nuisance which prevented the defendant from erecting and operating its line in the new location, and that it had, therefore, a right to cut them, under the circumstances. Its right to use the highway at all, for the purpose of erecting and operating a telephone line, is given, as we have seen, by statute, and it is given expressly on condition that it shall not be exercised so as to "injure any tree without the consent of the owner." If the construction hereinbefore put upon the statutes which we have been considering is correct, the facts set up in the third answer, even if true, furnished no justification for cutting and trimming the six trees.

There is no error.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Hermann Julius MEYER, doing Business under the Name of Bibliographical Institute Meyer,

v.

1. For the purpose of determining the right of one who after contracting to furnish electrotype plates took partners into his business and completed his contract without notifying the other party of the change of firm, to relief against one who has broken his contract as to the use to be made of the plates, the contract must be regarded as performed, not by a volunteer stranger, but by the contracting party acting through the partnership.

2. A third person, who buys the plates, sheets, and copyright of a published work, cannot be considered as the successor in business of the publisher within the meaning of a contract by the publisher in procuring electrotype plates for it that they should be used only by the publisher "or his heirs or successors in business."

3. An agreement by the purchaser of electrotype plates that he will not sell them to other parties or multiply them for the purpose of selling them is valid and enforceable, and a sale by him to a third person

NOTE.—The above case presents some interesting questions which are believed to be also novel in respect to the use of electrotype plates and contracts restricting such use.

On the matter of liquidated damages, see some annotation to Hathaway v. Lynn (Wis.) 6 L. R. A. 551, and King Iron Bridge & Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis (C. C. E. D. Mo.) 10 L. R. A. 829; also the later cases of Condon v. Kemper (Kan.) 13 L. R. A. 671; Tode v. Gross (N. Y.) 13 L. R. A. 652; Wilhelm v. Eaves (Or.) 14 L. R. A. 297; Tennessee Mfg. Co. v. James (Tenn.) 15 L. R. with no restriction as to the use to be made of them may give his vendor a right to substantial damages for breach of the agreement.

4. A contract relating to what is to be done in Massachusetts, dated and signed there, and sent to a foreign country for acceptance, which is to be signified by telegram sent to the signers there, is a Massachusetts contract governed by its laws.

5. A contract that in case of the wrongful use of electrotype plates the purchaser shall be responsible for the damages caused the seller, and shall pay a fine to him "equal to the tenfold price of the wrongly used electrotypes," provides for a penalty and not liquidated damages, which cannot be enforced under Massachusetts law beyond the actual damages caused by the breach.

6. Under a contract by two firms for the purchase of electrotype plates to be used in a publication in which they are jointly interested, which contract is in form joint, and provides that they will be "responsible for any and all wrong use of said electrotypes," a firm which sells all its interest to the other may be held for damages caused by a breach of the contract by the other after the sale.

(October 19, 1895.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to recover damages for breach of a contract regarding the use of certain electrotype plates. Judgment for plaintiff.

Plaintiff conducted a publishing house at Leipsic, Germany. Defendants purchased from him certain plates for illustrations to be used in a work which they were publishing, and received the same under a contract, of which the following is a copy:

The undersigned, Messrs. Estes & Lauriat and Messrs. S. E. Cassino & Co. of Boston, Mass., U. S. A., hereby agree to use all electrotypes ordered from the Bibliographical Institute Meyer, in Leipsic, only for the purpose of illustrating works to be published by the said Estes & Lauriat and the said S. E. Cassino & Co. or their heirs or successors in business, in the English language in the United States of America.

Estes & Lauriat and S. E. Cassino & Co. agree not to sell these electrotypes to any other parties, nor to multiply them for the purpose of selling them, and to be responsible for every and all wrong use of said electrotypes to the amount of any damages which may have been caused thereby to the Bibliographical Institute Meyer, and to pay furthermore a fine to the Bibliographical Institute Meyer equal to the tenfold price of the wrongly used electrotypes.

Estes & Lauriat,
S. E. Cassino & Co.

Plaintiff contended that defendants had broken their contract as to the use of the plates, and brought this action for damages.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. William Schofield, for plaintiff:

This contract is incidental to a sale of electrotype plates, restricting the use of the plates sold. It is a unilateral contract.

First Nat. Bank v. Watkins, 154 Mass. 385; Great Northern R. Co. v. Witham, L. R. 9 C. P. 16.

This contract imposes a joint liability upon all who were members of the two defendant firms at the time when they signed it.

Donahoe v. Emery, 9 Met. 63; White v. Tyndall, L. R. 13 App. Cas 263; Bartlett v. Robbins, 5 Met. 184; New Haven & N. Co. v. Hayden, 119 Mass. 361; Fenton v. Lord, 128 Mass. 466; Levy v. Sale, 37 L. T. N. S. 709; Copland v. Laporte, 3 Ad. & El. 517; Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 1353.

The situation of the parties, and the facts known to both, show that joint liability was intended.

Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 248, 5 L. R. A. 586.

The rule of construction that the covenant is joint where the interest is joint, and several where the interest is several, has no application except to covenantees and promisees.

Chitty, Cont. 11th Am. ed. 1355; Eccleston v. Clipsham, 1 Wms. Saund. 154, note 1; White v. Tyndall, supra.

It is resorted to in the case of covenantees only when the contract is ambiguous, or consistent with a joint or several promise. It cannot contradict the writing.

Eccleston v. Clipsham, 1 Wms. Saund. 155, note 1 (c); Sorsbie v. Park, 12 Mees. & W. 147; Cleaves v. Lord, 3 Gray, 66; Capen v. Barrows, 1 Gray, 376; Clapp v. Pawtucket Inst. for Savings, 15 R. I. 489.

The contract being joint by its express terms, and also by construction with the aid of all material extrinsic facts, there are no equitable considerations in favor of defendants Estes & Lauriat.

Clarke v. Bickers, 14 Sim. 639; White v. Tyndall, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 263; Langdell, Summary of Laws of Contracts, 2d ed. § 4, p. 3; Jordan v. Dobbins, 122 Mass. 168, 23 Am. Rep. 305; Offord v. Davies, 12 C. B. N. S. 748; Great Northern R. Co. v. Witham, L. R. 9 C. P. 16.

The case of defendant Cassino stands no different in principle from that of defendants Estes & Lauriat.

Lindley, Partn. 6th ed. 231; Hoby v. Roebuck, 7 Taunt. 157; Graham v. Whichelo, 1 Cromp. & M. 188; Dickson v. Indianapolis Colton Mfg. Co. 63 Ind. 9; Buxton v. Edwards, 134 Mass. 567.

The sale to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. of plates furnished by the plaintiff was a breach of the contract, for which all the defendants are liable.

"Successors in business" are those who take and carry on the whole of a business, commonly at the same place, or under the same business name.

Lindley, Partn. 6th ed. 441; Hoxie v. Chaney, 143 Mass. 592, 58 Am. Rep. 149; Churton v. Douglas, 1 Johns. (V. C.) Eng. 174; Gray v. Smith, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 208; Morgan v. Schuyler, 79 N. Y. 490, 35 Am. Rep. 543; Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 14 L. R. A. 161; Lodge v. Weld, 139 Mass. 499.

The testimony of defendants Estes and Whidden, that "by the custom of the publishing trade in Boston, a firm which purchases all the plates, sheets, and rights of publication of a work is considered the successor in business of the firm making the sale, so far as that work is concerned," is incompetent.

Haskins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 514; Sears v. LeBetter, 137 Mass. 374; Mooney v. Howard Ins. Co. 138 Mass. 375, 52 Am. Rep. 277; Howard v. Great Western Ins. Co. 109 Mass. 384.

In this contract the parties have provided expressly for all the consequences of a breach. The stipulation for the payment of the tenfold price is not to be treated as a penalty, but as a promise for the payment of money upon the happening of a certain event which is within the control of the promisors. It is the substance of the agreement.

Lynde v. Thompson, 2 Allen, 456; Fisk v. Gray, 11 Allen, 132; Cushing v. Drew, 97 Mass. 445; Leary v. Laflin, 101 Mass. 334; Galsworthy v. Strutt, 1 Exch. 659.

There are, or may be, two elements to be considered in awarding compensation: (1) the actual loss to the plaintiff; (2) the profits of the defendant from infringement.

The stipulations in question were no doubt made because of the inherent difficulty of assessing damages for a breach, and they provide for both elements of compensation.

Elbinger Actien-Gesellschafft v. Armstrong, L. R. 9 Q. B. 473; Clemens v. Estes, 22 Fed. Rep. 899; Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Smythe, 27 Fed. Rep. 914; Tode v. Gross, 127 N. Y. 480, 13 L. R. A. 652; Black v. Henry G. Allen Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 618, 9 L. R. A. 433.

Where a covenant is "to pay a particular liquidated sum," a court of equity cannot make a new covenant for a man nor is there any room for compensation or relief.

Lowe v. Peers, 4 Burr. 2225; Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron & C. Co. L. R. 11 App. Cas. 332; Birch v. Stephenson, 3 Taunt. 469; Hurst v. Hurst, 4 Exch. 571, 19 L. J. Where the covenant is secured by "liquidated damages," the plaintiff can proceed for the liquidated damages at law, or for performance of the principal agreement in equity.

This contract is governed by the law of Saxony

The contract being unilateral, it was mere nudum pactum when signed and sent to Leipsic, and became binding by being accepted and acted on there.

Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 28 Am. Rep. 241; Hill v. Chase, 143 Mass. 129; McIntyre v. Parks, 3 Met. 207; Pattison v. Mills, 1 Dow & C. 342, 3 Wils. & S. 218.

Prima facie a contract is governed in respect to its nature, vaildity, and interpretation by the law of the place where it is made.

Milliken v. Pratt, supra; Baxter Nat. Bank v. Talbot, 154 Mass. 215, 13 L. R. A. 52; Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Met. 381; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788; Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. 115; Bar, Private Int. Law, 2d ed. § 249, p. 540.

A contract valid in the state or country where it is made will be enforced even in a state or country where it would be invalid, provided it be not there contrary to public policy or morals.

In respect to performance, the part of the contract in question is a stipulation for the payment of money, and no place of payment being mentioned, for the purpose of deciding what law shall govern the place of making, the contract is also the place of performance.

Hill v. Chase, 143 Mass. 129; Murphy v. Collins, 121 Mass. 6; Merchants' Bank v. Griswold, 72 N. Y. 472, 28 Am. Rep. 159; 5 Dane, Abr. 176.

This stipulation being valid by the law of Saxony and invalid by the law of Massachusetts, the presumption is that the contract was made with a view to that law which would give it full effect.

Messrs. Elder, Wait, & Whitman, for defendant Estes:

There was no breach of the contract by the sale to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.

The action cannot be maintained by this plaintiff.

As to the plates furnished by the partnership, there can be no doubt that their sale or misuse, if any, by the defendants is not within the protection of the contract.

Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28, 25 Am. Rep. 9; Hills v. Snell, 104 Mass. 173, 6 Am. Rep. 216.

There was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendants as to plates furnished by a third person.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The agreement sued on must be regarded as an agreement made by the partnership of Estes & Lauriat and S. E. Cassino & Co. with Hermann Julius Meyer, then doing business in Leipsic under the name of "The Bibliographical Institute Meyer." After this agreement had been entered into, and some of the electrotype plates had been ordered and furnished through the English and Foreign Electrotype Agency, Hermann Julius Meyer took his two sons into partnership, and proceeded to carry on the same business under the same name as before; and after this other plates were ordered by the defendants and furnished by the partnership. It appears by the report that "no notice was given by the plaintiff to the defendants, or either of them, or by the defendants, or either of them, to the plaintiff, of any change in their business relations." So far as appears, the defendants did not know that the plaintiff had taken his sons into partnership, or that any other person than the plaintiff had any interest in the business carried on under the name of "The Bibliographical Institute Meyer." There is no evidence, therefore, that the defendants made any contract with the partnership composed of the plaintiff and his two sons, and the plates furnished after the formation of this partnership must, we think, as between the parties to this suit, be regarded as furnished by the plaintiff to the defendants, in pursuance of the contract. It is not a case where a stranger to a contract voluntarily undertakes to perform it. After the formation of the partnership the plates were furnished, in legal contemplation, by the plaintiff, acting through the partnership of which he was a member. The form of the contract shows a joint agreement on the part of Estes & Lauriat and S. E. Cassino & Co. with the plaintiff. Bartlett v. Robbins, 5 Met. 184; Donahoe v. Emery, 9 Met. 63; Boutelle v. Smith, 116 Mass. 111; White v. Tyndall, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 263. There are no words in it that indicate a several liability of these two firms. The previous correspondence between the parties had informed the plaintiff that the two firms of Estes & Lauriat and Cassino & Co. were jointly interested in certain publications, and the letter of Estes & Lauriat to the plaintiff, inclosing a copy of the agreement, signed by the two firms, which the plaintiff was to accept or reject by telegraph, contained the following sentences, viz.: "You must understand that Messrs. S. E. Cassino & Co. have an equal interest in this publication with ourselves, and it is a physical impossibility for us to execute any agreement by which they shall not be equally bound; and since they join us in this agreement, you have all the protection which you would have in an agreement from us alone." "Should you decline to accept this agreement joining Messrs. Cassino & Co. to us in your form of agreement, please cable the following words, 'Estes, Boston: No. Meyer,' and by this we shall understand that the negotiation is entirely at an end, as it is impossible for us to make any agreement which does not connect Messrs. Cassino & Co. with us in ordering these cuts for this enterprise." The enterprise referred to was the publication of an illustrated work of natural history, in six volumes, of which each of the two firms was to publish at its own expense three volumes. Each firm was to engage in the sale of the entire work, and was to receive for its own use the wholesale price of that part of the work published by it. It was a part of the plan between the two firms that some of the plates used to illustrate the work should be obtained from the plaintiff; that a part of these plates should be used in each of the volumes; that each firm should pay for the plates used in the volumes published by it, and that the plates should be the separate property of the firm which paid for them; but it does not appear that this agreement between the two firms as to the separate property in the plates used by each firm was known to the plaintiff. As the volumes to be published were published as an entire work, although, as between themselves, the two firms owned the separate volumes, the two firms may be said to be jointly interested in the publication. The agreement sued on is that the defendants will use all the electrotype plates to be ordered through the plaintiff "only for the purpose of illustrating works to be published by the said Estes & Lauriat and the said S. E. Cassino & Co., or their heirs or successors in business, in the English language, and in the United States of America," and they agree "not to sell these electrotypes to any other parties, nor to multiply them for the purpose of selling them, and to be responsible for every and all wrong use of said electrotypes to the amount of any damages," etc. This language literally relates to a publication by the two firms jointly, or by their heirs or successors in business; but the agreement not to sell these electrotypes to any other parties must mean to any other parties than some of themselves, and, as the two firms were separate partnerships, and were known to be such, the agreement must be held to confer the right upon either of the firms and its successor in business to use the electrotype plates for the purpose of illustrating works to be published by either firm separately, as well as the right to use the plates for illustrating works to be published by the two firms jointly, although the intention of the parties existing at the time of the making of the contract was that the electrotype plates should be used in publishing the natural history in six volumes, in the manner hereinbefore set forth. After making this contract, it was found impracticable for the two firms to publish the natural history together, and on September 24, 1883, Estes & Lauriat sold to S. E. Cassino & Co. all their interest in the work, and delivered to Cassino & Co. all materials and other articles owned by them relating to the history, and after that time Estes & Lauriat had nothing to do with the publication. At the time of the execution of the agreement sued on, the firm of S. E. Cassino & Co. was composed of Samuel E. Cassino and Bradlee Whidden. On December 31, 1885, this firm was dissolved, and Cassino sold all his interest in the firm assets to Whidden. Whidden continued to carry on the business under the old firm name until about December 31, 1886, and after that continued still in business as a publisher under his own name. On July 5, 1887, Whidden sold and delivered to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., of Boston, the property known as the "Standard Natural History," which is the name adopted for the work, "said property consisting of all the electrotype plates of six volumes as published; all duplicate cuts ever made, now owned by him; the dies for binding cloth books; all stock in sheets, flat or folded; all bound stock whether in paper parts, cloth, sheep, or half or full morocco; and the copyright of the work;" and he guaranteed that the property conveyed "is free from any and all encumbrances or liens on account of copyright, or on account of any other claim or indebtedness whatsoever." At the time of this sale all of the history had been stereotyped, and the electrotype plates for the illustrations had been soldered into the stereotype plates, and sets of the history had been printed in six large octavo volumes. The report finds that the work was the most valuable part of the assets of S. E. Cassino & Co., and was the "principal live publication" of the firm.

Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., after the purchase, continued the publication of the work, using, also, with their own imprint, the printed sheets purchased of Whidden. They made some revision of the text, and continued to publish and sell the work as revised down to the time of the trial, and were then publishing it. After the revision the work was called "The Riverside Natural History." But few alterations had been made by the revision, and it was substantially the same work as that prepared and printed by Cassino & Co. Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. have never made any use of the electrotype plates except in the publication of this natural history. They had no connection with the firm of Estes & Lauriat, or with Cassino & Co., and they had no other rights in the plates derived from any one, except the rights derived from Whidden by the purchase. They sold, at their place of business in Massachusetts, 100 copies of the history to one Trench, of the firm of Kegan, Paul, Trench, & Co., of London, England, which were bound by Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., with the imprint of the London firm as the publishers, and these were sent to London. Subsequently the London firm found that there was some trouble about the sale of the work in Great Britain, and 38 of the 100 copies were returned to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. It is found in the report that Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. had no knowledge of any restriction as to the sale of said plates, and that there was no competent evidence at the trial of any damage to the plaintiff by reason of said sale of 100 copies.

Some evidence was introduced at the trial by the defendants "that by the custom of the publishing trade in Boston, a firm which purchases all the plates, sheets, and rights of publication of a work is considered the 'successor in business' of the firm making the sale, so far as that work is concerned." There has been no finding of fact on this point. It is evident, we think that Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. were not in any general sense the successor in business of either the firm of Estes & Lauriat, or of Cassino & Co., or of Whidden. The original agreement contemplated that Estes & Lauriat or Cassino & Co. might use the plates in any of their publications, whether made by them jointly or separately, and that the successor in business of either firm should have the same right; but this probably means that the successor to the business generally of either firm should have the same right as the firm had, not that every purchaser of the right to continue any single publication of the firm should have the right to use the plates while the firm continued in business, and might use the plates in other publications. The sale to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. did not restrict them to the use of the plates in illustrating the Standard Natural History, and therefore this evidence became immaterial. When the natural history had been printed by means of the stereotype plates into which the electrotype plates had been soldered, and had been published by Cassino & Co. or by Whidden, who may be regarded as the successor in business of Cassino & Co., and when the publication had been sold, with the plates, to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., it may be that the continuance of this publication by Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., even if it were a technical breach of the agreement, could not work anything more than nominal damages to the plaintiff. The agreement, however, is that Estes & Lauriat and Cassino & Co. will not sell these electrotype plates to any other parties; and they have been sold to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., who, so far as appears, must be regarded as another party than the defendants, "their heirs or successors in business," and the sale must be considered as a breach of the agreement. If the damages directly resulting from the publication of the history by Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. cannot be regarded as substantial, yet if, by the sale, Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. acquired the absolute property in the plates, so that they can use them in any of their publications, and can multiply them, and sell them to others to be used, the sale may be of substantial damage to the plaintiff.

It sufficiently appears that the plaintiff, at the date of the agreement, was the general owner of the plates, and of the right to multiply, sell, and use them, and that in his dealings with the defendants he required an agreement on their part that they would use them only in their own publications, and would not sell them, or multiply them for the purpose of selling them, in order that he might have the opportunity of selling the plates to other persons who might wish to use them in their publications, or might be able to protect persons to whom he had already sold the right to use the plates. It does not appear that the plates or the prints from them were protected, or could have been protected, by a copyright in the United States, but the plaintiff meant to accomplish much the same result, in requiring this agreement from the defendants, as could be reached under a copyright law by a license. It is not entirely clear from the agreement whether the plates were sold absolutely to the defendants, or were let to them to be used in a particular way. The prints, after they had been published, unless protected by a copyright, could be copied by anyone, and plates could be engraved and electrotype plates made; but this would be a costly process when compared with that of multiplying the plates. We think that it must be held that the plates were sold to the defendants so that the title passed to them. The agreement on their part not to sell them to other parties, nor to multiply them for the purpose of selling, is in the nature of an agreement in restraint of trade. Considering the nature of the property, we are of opinion that such an agreement is reasonable, and one which ought to be enforced between the parties to it. See Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Smythe, 27 Fed. Rep. 914; Clemens v. Estes, 22 Fed. Rep. 899; Parton v. Prang, 3 Cliff. 537, Fed. Cas. No. 10,784. The price to be paid for the plates, if they were to become the absolute property of the purchaser, without any restriction upon the use to be made of them, might reasonably be more than if they were purchased under such an agreement as is the foundation of this suit. It must be considered that the title of Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., and their right to use the plates, are unaffected by this agreement; and therefore it is impossible to say, on the facts and evidence reported, that the defendants are liable only in nominal damages.

In determining the measure of damages, the first question is whether the contract is to be governed by the law of Massachusetts or by the law of the Kingdom of Saxony. We think that it is to be governed by the law of Massachusetts. The contract was signed in Massachusetts, and sent to the plaintiff at Leipsic, Saxony. It did not become a contract until the plaintiff accepted it, and notified the defendants of such acceptance, which he did by telegram sent to them at Boston. Lewis v. Browning, 130 Mass. 173; Pine v. Smith, 11 Gray, 38; Hill v. Chase, 143 Mass. 129. The contract relates to what is to be done by the defendants in the United States of America. The defendants are described as "of Boston, Mass., U. S. A.," and the date of the contract is Boston. We think that it must be regarded as a contract to be performed in Massachusetts, and that the law of Massachusetts, which is also the law of the forum, must determine the damages to be recovered in the action.

The provisions of the contract are that the defendants are "to be responsible for every and all wrong use of said electrotypes to the amount of any damages which may have been caused thereby to the Bibliographical Institute Meyer, and to pay furthermore a fine to the Bibliographical Institute Meyer equal to the tenfold price of the wrongly used electrotypes." The principal question in this part of the case is whether this fine is to be considered as a penalty. Some evidence has been introduced that by the law of the Kingdom of Saxony the plaintiff, in the case of a wrong use of the electrotype plates, could recover both the damages and the fine, although there is the testimony of one jurisconsult that under that law the plaintiff is not entitled to recover both, but can recover either one or the other, as he may elect. As by the terms of the contract the fine is in addition to the amount of any damages which may have been caused by the wrong use of the electrotype plates, it is impossible to hold that by our law the fine can be considered as liquidated damages. The amount of the fine is plainly intended as a penalty to be paid in addition to the amount of any actual damages suffered. Higginson v. Weld, 14 Gray, 165. The agreement does not provide that the damages suffered shall be considered to be tenfold the price of the wrongly used electrotype plates, but it leaves the damages to be assessed in the usual way, and provides that the fine shall be paid in addition to the damages, whatever they may be. As under our law the fine must be considered as in the nature of a penalty, it cannot be recovered, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover only the amount of the damages which have been caused by the breach of the contract. There may be some question whether this fine was intended to cover a breach of the contract which consisted in selling the electrotype plates to other parties than the defendants, their heirs or successors in business, when the plates have not actually been used for any other purpose than that for which the defendants were authorized to use them. Whether the fine was intended to cover all breaches of the contract or not is, however, immaterial, because, as a fine, it cannot be enforced. Damages are recoverable in the present suit for a breach of the agreement caused by the sale of the plates to Houghton, Mifflin, & Co., and as, by the purchase, Houghton, Mifflin, & Co. have acquired the right to use the plates for any of their publications, as well as the right to multiply them and sell them to others to be used, the damages to the plaintiff cannot be said to be nominal. It appears in the copy of the papers from the superior court that a jury has already assessed the damages, but this is not mentioned in the report of the presiding judge, and if it is a fact we can take no notice of it.

By the terms of that report the amount of the damages is to be determined by a jury, unless the parties agree to have it determined by an assessor

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

George D. WESNER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Enoch O'BRIEN.

(56 Kan. 724.)

1. The district court has power to award land as alimony in a divorce proceeding based only on constructive notice to the defendant, where the plaintiff alleges sufficient grounds for divorce and alimony in the petition, and asks to have such land appropriated as alimony, and where the publication notice contains a particular description of the land sought to be appropriated, and the nature of the relief demanded.

2. An action for divorce must be brought in the county where the plaintiff resides, and when rightfully brought, and alimony is asked as an incident of the divorce, any lands of the defendant brought within the control of the court by proper averments in the petition and notice may be awarded as alimony, although they may lie in a county of the state other than where the action was brought.

*Headnotes by JOHNSTON, J.

NOTE.—The authorities on the general subject of the validity of a decree of divorce obtained on publication or service out of the state where the defendant did not appear are found in a note to Butler v. Washington (La.) 19 L. R. A. 814.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for the Southern Department, Eastern Division, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Miami County in favor of plaintiff in an ejectment proceeding to recover possession of land of which defendant had taken possession as assignee from the wife of plaintiff to whom it had been awarded as alimony in a divorce proceeding. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John C. Sheridan, for plaintiff in error:

The statute provides (§§ 54, 72, and 641 of the Code) for suits for divorce against nonresidents, and §§ 646, and 645 of the Code provide that "when a divorce shall be granted" the "court shall make provision for the guardianship, custody, support, and education of the minor children" (§ 645), and when, "by reason of the fault or aggression of the husband, the wife shall . . . be allowed such alimony out of the husband's real and personal property as the court shall think reasonable, . . . which alimony may be allowed to her in real or personal property, or both, or by decreeing to her such sum of money, payable either in gross or in instalments, as the court may deem just and equitable." (Code, § 646).

Where the court has authority to grant the divorce, it not only has the authority, but by statute is required, when asked, to decide and determine these other matters, as the custody of minor children, alimony, division of property, etc., which are, by statute, made necessary incidents and consequences of the divorce.

Such being the authority, if not the absolute mandatory requirement, of our statute, the decisions of other states cannot apply.

Jurisdiction to pass a decree in personam depends on the court having authority over the person, either by regular summons or by voluntary appearance.

So far as an action for divorce relates to alimony it is a proceeding in personam.

The action for divorce was instituted and determined in Johnson county. There was no attachment; no judgment upon which execution or order of sale could issue; no lien; no process asked for or issued by which the strong hand of the law was laid on the land. It was not situated in the county in which the action was brought, was pending, and was finally determined. If there had been an execution levy and judicial sale of the land to pay costs, it would have conferred no title on the purchaser at such a sale.

Lytle v. Lytle, supra.

The theory that if the court had jurisdiction over the person and subject matter it could do almost anything it pleased, and no matter how irregular or unwarranted its proceedings they were good until reversed, was productive of so much injustice that it provoked hostile criticism for many years and resulted in the esta-lishment of another element in defining jurisdiction.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by Enoch O'Brien to recover from George D. Wesner a tract of land situate in Miami county, and the rents and profits of the same for a period of three years. Prior to June 18, 1875, the land was owned by O'Brien, and on that day, in a divorce proceeding brought by his wife, Annie O'Brien, it was decreed to her as alimony. Afterwards Annie O'Brien transferred the land to another, and Wesner derived his title from that source, and about three years before the commencement of the action he took possession of the same, and made substantial improvements thereon. More than fourteen years after the divorce proceedings, Enoch O'Brien began this proceeding, challenging the effect of the decree and the title of Wesner. On the trial it appeared that the action for divorce was begun in Johnson county, and, as summons could not be served upon Enoch O'Brien within the state, service was obtained by publication; and in the notice it was expressly stated that she would ask judgment for the custody and control of an infant son, and that the tract of land in question should be decreed to her as alimony. The constructive notice was given in the manner prescribed by law, and the judgment awarding her the land as alimony was based solely upon constructive notice. On the trial of this cause, record evidence of the divorce proceeding, and the decree appropriating the lands in question as alimony, was excluded by the court because it appeared that Enoch O'Brien had no other than constructive notice of the proceedings, and because the land was not in the county within which the court was sitting. This ruling presents the controlling question of the case. It is conceded that constructive notice was sufficient to authorize a divorce of the parties, but it is contended that a decree terminating the marriage relation was the full extent of the jurisdiction and power of the court. The determination of the question depends, to a great extent, upon the statutes of the state; and that the state has full power, through its legislature and courts, to regulate and control the status of its citizens, and to dispose of or control real property, to whomsoever it may belong, within its limits, will hardly be denied. It is provided that service may be made by publication "in actions to obtain a divorce, where the defendant resides out of the state," and "in actions brought against a nonresident of the state . . . having in this state property . . . sought to be taken by any of the provisional remedies or to be appropriated in any way." It is also authorized where the action relates to real or personal property in this state in which a nonresident defendant has or claims an interest, or where the relief demanded consists wholly or partly in excluding him from any interest therein. Civil Code, § 72. These provisions, if valid, afford authority to dissolve the marriage relation upon constructive notice, and also to appropriate the real property of the nonresident defendant. In Dillon v. Heller, 39 Kan. 599, it is held that "Kansas is supreme except so far as its powers and authority are limited by the Constitution and laws of the United States. And within the Constitution and laws of the United States, the courts of Kansas may have all the jurisdiction over all persons and things within the state which the Constitution and laws of Kansas may give to them, and the mode of obtaining this jurisdiction may be prescribed wholly, entirely, and exclusively by the statutes of Kansas To obtain jurisdiction of anything within the state of Kansas, the statutes of Kansas may make service by publication as good as any other kind of service." The same view has been expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is said: "The state, through its tribunals, may subject property situated within its limits owned by nonresidents to the payment of the demand of its own citizens against them; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no respect infringes upon the sovereignty of the state where the owners are domiciled. Every state owes protection to its own citizens, and, when nonresidents deal with them, it is a legitimate and just exercise of authority to hold and appropriate any property owned by such nonresidents to satisfy the claims of its citizens." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. In the exercise of this power, lands of nonresident owners are appropriated for the taxes assessed against them upon a publication notice only; mortgage and mechanics' liens are foreclosed against nonresident defendants where there is neither personal service nor appearance; and the property of nonresident defendants lying within the territorial jurisdiction of the court is subjected to the payment of claims and demands, in a variety of ways, without other service than by publication. Dillon v. Heller, supra. It was therefore competent for the legislature to provide for the granting of a divorce upon constructive service, and, as alimony is an incident of divorce, it may be awarded in the same proceeding if it is within the power of the court.

Did the district court of Johnson county exceed its jurisdiction in decreeing the land in question as alimony? It had jurisdiction of the plaintiff, who was a resident of Kansas and of the county in which the action was brought. The child, whose custody she asked, but who died before the decree was rendered, was within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The land sought to be appropriated as alimony was within the state and the operation of its laws, and subject to the control and disposition of its courts. The wife asked that this particular tract be subjected to the payment of her claim for support, definitely describing it in her petition, and setting out facts entitling her to alimony. That such relief was demanded was expressly stated in the publication notice wherein the land was particularly described. In this way the land was brought before the court, and subjected to its control. It is true, as the authorities cited by the defendant in error show, that upon such a notice a judgment for money, or one which could be enforced against the person of the defendant, cannot be rendered A court has no authority to render a judgment in personam without obtaining jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. Here, however, the land was brought within the control of the court in what was substantially a proceeding in rem. The complaining wife was here. The land sought to be subjected as alimony was here. She had an inchoate interest in the land, which possessed the element of property to such a degree that she could maintain an action during the life of her husband for its protection, and for relief from fraudulent alienation by her husband. Busenbark v. Busenbark, 33 Kan. 572. It was necessary for the support of the wife, who was seeking a divorce, and the law provides that alimony may be awarded in such cases. The land was subject to the laws of the state, and was within the reach of the proceedings and process of its courts. In such a case we think the court has power, not only to terminate the marriage relation, but to fix the custody and control of the children of the marriage who are before the court, and to appropriate as alimony any real property of the defendant within its territorial jurisdiction. It is true that there was no formal seizure of the property, but a seizure of land in such a case is little more than a form. The essential matter is that the defendant shall have legal notice of the proposed appropriation; and this is afforded by the publication notice, which warns the defendant that one of the purposes of the proceeding is the sequestration of the land. It refers interested parties to the petition, in which the land is definitely described, and wherein it is asked that the land be set apart as alimony. A formal seizure is no more essential to the jurisdiction of the court, in a proceeding of this kind, than in an action to quiet title to land, based alone on constructive service; and in the latter case it was held that complete jurisdiction was acquired by the court without formal seizure, and in the same manner as it was obtained in the divorce proceeding. Dillon v. Heller, supra. The theory that the limit of the power of the court in a divorce suit, where there is no personal service, is the dissolution of the marriage, does not obtain in this state. In the early case of Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Kan. 181, it was held that upon such service a decree barring the defendant of any interest in the plaintiff's property was valid and binding. See also Chapman v. Chapman, 48 Kan. 636.

We cannot sustain the view of the court of appeals that the jurisdiction of the court in such a proceeding does not reach lands in a county other than where the court is sitting. Wesner v. O'Brien, 1 Kan. App. 416. The jurisdiction depends upon the domicil of the plaintiff, and not upon the location of the land sought to be appropriated as alimony. It must be brought in the county of which the plaintiff is a resident, and cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff has been an actual resident of the state, in good faith, for one year before the filing of the petition. Civil Code, § 640. Alimony is an incident of the divorce proceeding, and, when the action is rightfully brought, any land within the operation of the laws of the state, and which has been brought within the control of the court, may be appropriated as alimony. The ancillary step in a divorce proceeding is not to be treated as an action brought to recover real estate, or to determine an interest therein, and is not governed by the provisions of the Code directing that such actions shall be brought in the county wherein the land, or some part thereof, is situated. The divorce action may be brought where the plaintiff resides, and only one action is necessary; and, when it is properly brought there is drawn to the court, and within its jurisdiction, any lands of the defendant sought to be appropriated as an incident of the divorce, wherever they may be situated within the state. If this were not the rule, how could lands of the defendant, situated in different parts of the state, be reached by a court granting the divorce upon either personal or constructive service? Must an action be brought in each county in which any of the land lies? And, if so, must the plaintiff acquire a residence in each before the court can be invested with authority to award the land as alimony? We think that only a single action is required or authorized, and that any land within the state, brought within the control of the court in the manner heretofore stated, is subject to its jurisdiction and decree, without regard to county lines or boundaries. For these reasons, the Court of Appeals erred in affirming the judgment of the District Court, which will be reversed, with directions to grant a new trial of the cause.

LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR of Baltimore et al.

(79 Md. 434.)

1. A gift in trust for the maintenance of a parish school, to the vestry of a Protestant Episcopal church, which is a corporation, is not void for indefiniteness and uncertainty.
2. A trust for the maintenance of a parish school is germane to the object for which a Protestant Episcopal church is incorporated.
3. The legal capacity of a corporation to take a devise of property in excess of the amount prescribed by its charter cannot be raised collaterally by private persons,—such as the testator's heirs or next of kin,—or in any other way except in a direct proceeding by the state.

NOTE.—Right of private persons to contest the power of a corporation to take or hold property.

The general rule on this subject seems to be that if the corporation has acquired the title and possession of the property its right to hold it cannot be questioned by a private citizen. But if it is necessary for the corporation to seek the aid of the court to perfect its title an interested individual may contest its claims, and the court will, in case it has no right to hold the property, refuse a decree in its favor.

State alone can question right of corporation in possession.

Messrs. Richard Bernard and Alfred D. Bernard, for appellee, Vestry of St. Mary's Church:

It is contended by the appellants that the devise to the vestry is void, because the parish school is not an incorporated body. This can hardly be considered an open question in Maryland.

If the testator's effort to impose an implied trust in favor of the parish school upon the devise in question should fail, it does not follow that the devise to the vestry should fail also.

Indefiniteness or uncertainty in the object or subject-matter of the trust sought to be imposed upon the legatee or devisee by precatory words is evidence that the testator's purpose was not mandatory but discretionary, leaving the legatee or devisee to take beneficially.

As to the right to contest the power of a foreign corporation to hold property, see note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Imp. Co. (N. Y.) 24 L. R. A. 322.

The rule as stated in the cases above cited is particularly applicable where the corporation has power to acquire property for some uses and to a certain amount, and the only question is whether or not it has exceeded such uses or amount.

Where a corporation is authorized by statute to hold real property necessary to enable it to carry on its business, the inquiry whether any particular real property is necessary for that business is a matter between the government and the corporation, and is no concern of third persons. Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547.

Where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take the title to real estate a conveyance to it is not void, but voidable. The title is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 405, 28 L. ed. 733; Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U.S. 282, 33 L. ed. 317.

In a controversy over certain real estate held by a church organization for the purpose of erecting a building on it, between two sections of the divided membership of the church, the court said: Whether the quantity of land was more than was necessary for the erection of the building is a question the court will not undertake to determine in this collateral proceeding. Such question belongs to the state. Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S. v. Church of Christ, 60 Fed. Rep. 937.

If a mining company has power to acquire a certain quantity of water for its purposes, the question whether or not it has exceeded the amount is for the government, and cannot be raised by an individual. Cole Silver Min. Co. v. Virginia & G. H. Water Co. 1 Sawy. 478.

The power of a corporation by the law under which it is created to purchase a particular character of property cannot be questioned in an action between it and another corporation or person. California State Teleg. Co. v. Alta Teleg. Co. 22 Cal. 398.

If a corporation is authorized to take real estate for some purposes, it cannot be made a question by a private individual whether its real estate has been acquired for authorized uses. Alexander v. Under the statute limiting the acreage which foreign corporations can hold, the state alone can take advantage of an excessive holding. American Mortg. Co. v. Tennille, 87 Ga. 28, 12 L. R. A. 529.

The question whether or not a municipal corporation authorized to hold real estate for certain purposes has transcended the exact limits of its power can only be raised by the state. Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 543; Land v. Coffman, 50 Mo. 243.

If a company has power to take property for some purposes, its title under a deed cannot be avoided on the ground that it is not for an authorized purpose, by any person other than the state. Gilbert v. Hole, 2 S. D. 164.

If a corporation is given power to purchase and hold only a certain class of lands, it may purchase and alien another class subject only to the interference of the state. Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 319; Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R. 418; Goundie v. Northampton Water Co. 7 Pa. 233.

It is stated in Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188, that where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but valid until assailed by a direct proceeding for that purpose.

If a corporation has power to take land for some purposes, a particular purchase cannot be questioned by a private individual. Hough v. Cook County Land Co. 73 Ill. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 230.

When a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take title to real estate a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable at the instance of the state. Russell v. Texas & P. R. Co. 68 Tex. 646.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The two questions presented by this appeal arise on a bill filed for the construction of the third clause of the will of the late Thomas H. Hanson, of Baltimore city. Under this clause certain warehouse property was devised to Wilton Snowden in trust to hold the same and collect the rents and income, and after paying all taxes, etc., to divide the net income thereof equally between "the Little Sisters of the Poor," "the vestry of St. Mary's Church," of Hampden, Baltimore county, and three other corporations not necessary now to mention. The trustee was authorized to sell the property so devised at any time within two years from the death of the testator, and to divide the net proceeds of such sale equally between the five corporations just referred to. In a subsequent part of the clause under consideration, the testator declared that it was his express desire that the money so received by "the vestry of St. Mary's Church" from the sale of said property should be applied by it to the maintenance of the parish school connected with said church. After paying the income to the appellants for more than a year without objection, the trustee, in the exercise of the power given by the will, sold the property for $13,500. This sale has been finally ratified by the circuit court of Baltimore city, and an account has been stated distributing the net proceeds of the sale in accordance with the provisions of the will. The widow and heirs at law of the testator have excepted to this account because of the sums of money allowed, respectively, to the Little Sisters and the vestry. As to the former, the exceptions are based on the ground that that corporation already has an estate, which it has acquired by purchase, gift, or devise, amounting, on the whole, to $50,000, the amount limited by its charter, and that therefore it is incapable of taking any more; and as to the vestry, the contention is that the devise or bequest to it is void for indefiniteness and uncertainty. The court below overruled these exceptions, and ratified the account, and from this action this appeal was taken by the exceptants.

In view of the worthy objects of the testator's bounty, it is fortunate that no settled rule or principle of law will prevent us from giving Church of Redemption v. Grace Church, 68 N. Y. 582.

The inability of the corporation to hold the property does not give immunity to wrongdoers.

When injury is done to real estate held by a corporation, the party by whose negligence it was done cannot escape liability by showing that the corporation was not permitted by its charter to acquire title to the property, or that it acquired it for a purpose not authorized by law. Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Green Bay & M. R. Co. 11 Biss. 334.

Where a corporation authorized to receive grants of land for the purposes of the corporation brings an action against a trespasser to recover possession of lands granted to it, such trespasser will not be heard to question the title of the corporation on the ground that it had no authority to hold them. Southern P. R. Co. v. Orton, 32 Fed. Rep. 457, 6 Sawy. 157.

Individuals will not be protected in trespassing upon land which a corporation holds in excess of its charter power. Whitman Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Baker, 3 Nev. 386.

A person who was not a party to the transaction by which a corporation acquired property cannot question its right to take and hold it, for the purpose of defeating its liability for loss while in its possession for transportation. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 17 Wis. 376.

Right of persons contracting with corporation.

A person who has made a sale of real estate to a bank cannot question its capacity to take the title after it has paid him the consideration for the purchase. Smith v. Sheeley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 358, 20 L. ed. 430.

And this is true in respect to corporations generally. Myers v. Croft, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 291, 20 L. ed. 578.

The heirs at law of a citizen of Illinois who has conveyed to a New York corporation cannot, in an action to set aside the conveyance on the ground that it was against the public policy of Illinois, raise the question that the grantee corporation has acquired a larger quantity of real estate than its charter allows. American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 352, 25 L. ed. 888.

That a corporation has no power to take property will not make property sold to it subject to seizure for the debts of the vendor. Edwards v. Fairbanks, 27 La. Ann. 449.

Whether or not a county can hold land which has been donated to it is not a question which the grantor or his assignees can raise. Quitman County v. Stritze, 70 Miss. 320.

That a corporation authorized to purchase land for one purpose applies it to another gives the vender no right to rescind the contract. Barrow v. Nashville & C. Turnp. Co. 9 Humph. 304.

The vendee of land from a corporation cannot defeat recovery of the purchase price by setting up inability of the corporation to take and hold real estate. Missouri Valley Land Co. v. Bushnell, 11 Neb. 192; Watts v. Gantt, 42 Neb. 869.

One who has contracted to purchase land from a corporation cannot avoid his contract because of the fact that in purchasing the land the corporation had exceeded its legal power. Walsh v. Barton, 24 Ohio St. 43.

One who purchases land from a corporation cannot defeat an action for the price by showing that the corporation had no power to take title to it. Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Proctor, 29 Vt. 93.

The power of an insurance company which has taken property in satisfaction of a mortgage to alien the same cannot be questioned by the vendee, although it has not disposed of it within the time specified by statute nor obtained a certificate permitting its being held longer. Home Ins. Co. v. Head, 30 Hun, 405.

One who has purchased coal from a corporation cannot defeat an action to recover the price by showing that the corporation had no right to hold the leases under which it mined the coal. Grant v. Henry Clay Coal Co. 80 Pa. 208.

Defective organization and forfeiture.

The right of an association assuming to be a corporation to hold property cannot be questioned on the ground that the corporation was defectively organized, in an action brought by an individual full effect to the testator's benevolent intention to aid these two corporations. What we have said in Eutaw Place Baptist Church v. Shirely, 67 Md. 494, and in Halsey v. Convention of P. E. Church, 75 Md. 275, would seem to be conclusive as to the validity of the bequest to the vestry. Indeed, the case first cited would appear to be identical with this. There the testator bequeathed to the Eutaw Place Baptist Church a sum of money, the income to be applied to the support of the Sunday school attached to the said church, and it was urged in that case, as here, that the bequest to the church was "in trust for an indefinite and uncertain body of individuals, that fluctuates from time to time, without legal succession," and that therefore the bequest was void because of this uncertainty, and want of legal identification of the objects to be benefited by the bequest. In meeting this contention this court said (Alvey, former chief judge, delivering the opinion): "If the bequest had simply been made to the church, without reference to the Sunday school, there could have been no question of its validity, and the church could have applied the fund to any purpose, and to promote any object within the sphere of its corporate powers and functions as a religious body." The principle so well settled in this state, "that a bequest to trustees for the benefit of a vague and indefinite object is equally as invalid as an immediate bequest to such object," was held to have no application whatever to the bequest to the Baptist church. There the bequest was to the church, to be applied to the Sunday school attached to the church, and although the school was held to be an unincorporated body, it was "shown to be an integral part of the church organization, and therefore embraced within the scope of the corporate functions and work of the church." In the case before us the testator directed the money to be paid to the vestry of St. Mary's Church, and he expressed the desire that it should be applied to the maintenance of its parish school. It is shown by the general canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church, as well as by the testimony of the Right Reverend William Paret, bishop of that church in this state, that the parochial school, wherever it exists, is, like the Sunday school, under the management of the rector of the parish, and an integral part of the church organization. These parochial schools, as appears by the bishop's testimony, are as old as the church itself in this country. "They were in the church before the war of the Revolution, when the church here stood as part of the British church." It is obvious, therefore, there citizen to set aside a contract which he had made with the association in its corporate name and character. Baker v. Neff, 73 Ind. 68.

The question of the forfeiture by a railroad of its land grant by reason of failure to complete the road within the time specified cannot be raised by an individual. Knevals v. Hyde (Neb.) 20 Alb. L. J. 371.

Suits by the corporation.

If the aid of the court is necessary to enable the corporation to obtain possession of the property, its inability to take the property will be decreed. United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142.

There is some seeming conflict of authority in cases of ejectment suits. Some of the cases hold that the corporation can maintain ejectment, while others deny it that right. Some of this conflict may be accounted for by considering the different purposes for which ejectment is brought in different localities. If ejectment is brought to establish title, it would seem that under the general rule as stated above the corporation must fail, whereas if it is brought against a trespasser the same rule would deny him the right to question the title of the plaintiff.

After a corporation which has power to hold land has purchased real estate, and the conveyance has been regularly executed to the corporation, the court will not, in an action of ejectment to recover possession of the land, decide whether or not it violated its charter in receiving the conveyance. Shewalter v. Pirner, 55 Mo. 218.

In an action by a ditch company to recover possession of land, defendants cannot question the necessity of the land for the purposes of the corporation. Natoma Water & Min. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544.

In ejectment by a corporation to recover land the defendant cannot defeat the action by showing that the corporation has no power to hold the land. Bone v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (Pa.) 5 Atl. 751.

Persons in possession of property belonging to a religious corporation cannot, for the purpose of defeating an action to recover the possession, set up that the plaintiff is not properly organized and therefore is incapable of holding property. That is a question for the state to raise on a direct proceeding. This rule is founded upon principles of common justice and public policy. It would be unjust and intolerable if every intruder were allowed to take advantage of every informality or irregularity of organization. East Norway L. N. E. Lutheran Church v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447.

But other cases have held that—

If the corporation has no power to acquire the land it cannot be permitted to recover possession of it in an action of ejectment. St. Peter's Roman Catholic Cong. v. Germain, 104 Ill. 440.

If property is given to a corporation for a purpose for which it has no right to hold it, its inability to so hold may be decreed in an action by it to recover possession of the property from a third person. Quaker Soc. v. Dickenson, 1 Dev. L. 189.

If the corporation should resort to ejectment to recover possession of the land, it might not be able to recover. Leasure v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 91 Pa. 491.

So, in Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, a purchase of land by a foreign corporation was held void in an ejectment suit by a private individual to recover possession of it.

Specific performance.

In a suit by a corporation to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land to it the defendant may raise the question of its ability to take the title. Pacific R. Co. v. Seely, 45 Mo. 212.

If it is necessary for the corporation to sue to compel a conveyance to it of the title to the real estate, the defendant may raise the question of its right to take and hold the land. Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 21, 33 L. ed. 513.

But one who has contracted to purchase land from a corporation cannot resist specific performance of the contract on the ground that the corporation exceeded its powers in purchasing the land. Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. (Va.) 136, 15 Am. Dec. 706.

So, a suit for specific performance of a contract with a corporation cannot be defeated on the ground that it has no right to take the title to the real estate which it acquired as a necessary foundacan be no foundation in fact for the contention that the testator directed the vestry to execute a trust not germane to the object for which it was incorporated. It might as well be contended that, because the corporation known as the vestry of St. Mary's Church was not expressly authorized by its charter, as in fact it is not so authorized, to maintain a Sunday school, such school is not germane to the powers of the church corporation. But, in addition to this view, it will be observed that the charter of the vestry provides that "the duties and powers of said vestry," which, of course, includes the rector of the church, "as to all matters properly belonging to a vestry, shall be as prescribed by the various clauses of the act of 1798, chap. 28, known as the 'vestry act'" and it is conceded by the appellants that a corporation formed under that act has power to maintain parish schools.

In the other case we have cited (Halsey's Case), where the devise was "to the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Maryland, to be held as a place for a church school for boys," the general principles in force in Maryland in regard to the jurisdiction of chancery, as applicable to the enforcement of trusts for charitable and religious purposes, were fully and clearly stated and it was there held that the devise to the convention was good.

We are unable to see any substantial distinction between the cases we have mentioned and the one we are now considering. In each of them there is a corporation capable of taking, and the object and character of the trust are definite and certain. "When these exist," said the present chief judge of this court, in delivering the opinion in Halsey's Case, and "when the gift is made to one capable of taking it, and when the trust is declared in definite terms, a court of chancery has the same power to enforce such a trust for a charitable or religious purpose as it has to enforce a trust for any other purpose." The case of Church Extension of M. E. Church v. Smith, 56 Md. 362, so much relied on by the appellants, has, we think, no application whatever to the case before us now, in which, as in the Eutaw Baptist Church Case, supra, the bequest was to the church, to be applied to a clear and well-defined object,—in the one case to the Sunday school, and in the other to the parish school,—both obviously within the sphere of the functions of the respective churches. In the Church Extension Case the bequests were de-tion for the execution of the contract. Old Colony R. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25, 66 Am. Dec. 394.

Property acquired by will.

The rule in regard to suits by the corporation is applied in case of wills. In such cases it is incumbent upon the beneficiary to show his right to the gift, and in case it fails to do so the court will distribute the property as intestate.

If a corporation claims property under a will it must show its ability to take, and an individual whose interests will be affected by its receiving the property may raise the question of its inability. Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, Reversing 3 Lans. 390.

If under its charter a corporation has no power to take real estate a devise to it will be void, and equity will not aid it in obtaining the land in an interpleader proceeding as against the claims of the heirs at law. State, Wiltbank, v. Bates, 2 Harr. (Del.) 18.

A devise or bequest to a corporation of property which will exceed the amount or value which the corporation is by law permitted to take will be void for the excess; and as to that excess no title will vest for a single instant in the corporation, but will vest instantly in the heir or next of kin. The power to raise the question of the right of the corporation to take is not confined to the state, but the question may be raised by the heirs or next of kin. Re McGraw's Estate, 111 N. Y. 66, 2 L. R. A. 387, Affirming 45 Hun, 354.

And the Supreme Court of the United States held that it had no jurisdiction of the case, as no Federal question was involved. Cornell University v. Fiske, 136 U. S. 152, 34 L. ed. 427.

A corporation which has no power to take lands by devise cannot hold them under a will. Starkweather v. American Bible Soc. 72 Ill. 50, 22 Am. Rep. 133.

If a corporation has acquired all the property it is enabled by its charter to take, a devise to it of further property will be void in favor of the testator's heirs at law. Cromie v. Louisville Orphans' Home Soc. 3 Bush, 365.

If a statute makes a bequest to a corporation void, it can take no title to property bequeathed, but such property will go the residuary legatee. Barton v. King, 41 Miss. 288.

If the corporation had no power to take by will, the court has so declared, although the question was in a controversy with an individual. Goddard v. Pomeroy, 36 Barb. 546.

A devise to a corporation which is incapable of taking is void. Ayres v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 3 Sandf. 351.

The question of the power of a corporation to take property under a will may be raised by other persons interested in the will, and the question is not limited to the state. Wood v. Hammond, 16 R. I. 98.

There are a few cases containing expressions to the contrary. But such expressions were either dicta, or have not been followed by courts of higher authority in the states where they were uttered.

In case of a charitable bequest to a city the court says if the trusts were in themselves valid in point of law, it is plain that no private person could have any right to inquire into or contest the right of the corporation to take the property. This right would exclusively belong to the state in its sovereign capacity and in its sole discretion to inquire into and contest the same by proper judicial proceedings. Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205.

And the principle of that case was followed in Girard v. Philadelphia, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 1, 19 L. ed. 53.

The question whether or not the property exceeds the permitted amount cannot be raised on a proceeding to test the validity of the devise, but its power to hold can only be questioned by the state. Rainey v. Laing, 58 Barb. 489; Howell v. Earp, 21 Hun, 395; White v. Howard, 38 Conn. 342.

Third persons cannot object to the capacity of a religious corporation to take a gift of property, on the ground that its property already equals the amount limited by the general law under which it is formed. De Camp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 36.

But that statement was questioned on appeal. De Camp v. Dobbins, 31 N. J. Eq. 690.

H. P. F.

clared void for want of certainty and definiteness in the objects to be benefited which is not the case here.

The objection to the validity of the bequest to the Little Sisters of the Poor is, as we have seen, based upon entirely different grounds, and presents an important question,—namely, whether the legal capacity of a corporation to take property in excess of the amount prescribed by its charter can be raised collaterally by private persons, or in any other way, except in a direct proceeding by the state. The corporation in question was formed in 1854 under the name of "the Trustees of the Roman Catholic Asylum for Widows in the City of Baltimore." Its name was subsequently changed to that of "The Little Sisters of the Poor," and the provision of its charter (Act 1854, chap. 199, § 1), is that it may "have, take, and hold by purchase, gift, and devise any estate and property not exceeding in the whole the sum of $50,000." Testimony was taken by both sides to show the actual value of the property held by this corporation, but we think it unnecessary to consider this question; for, conceding that the charter limits have been exceeded, it is not for the appellants to complain so long as the state, which created the corporation, remains silent. The doctrine of ultra vires, as applied to contracts generally, relied on by the appellants, has no application here. The question is as to the validity of a bequest. Nor is there any doubt as to the intention of the testator. He intended this part of his property to go to The Little Sisters, and therefore, if we are prevented by no rule of law to the contrary, we must give full effect to his intention, as expressed in his will.

In regard to the question before us, there has been considerable conflict of authority. The court of appeals of New York in Re McGraw's Estate, 111 N. Y. 66, 2 L. R. A. 387, announced the doctrine relied on by the appellants here, but the Supreme Court of the United States in Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. ed. 401, adhere to the contrary doctrine,—namely, that restrictions imposed by the charter of a corporation upon the amount of property it may hold cannot be taken advantage of collaterally by private persons, but only by the state in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. And it was so held in a case where, as here, the heirs of a decedent filed a bill to have declared void certain devises to a charitable corporation which, it was averred, would swell the amount of property owned by the corporation to a value greater than the charter authorized. It cannot be denied that this corporation had power to take and hold any estate and property not exceeding the charter limits, and the devise, therefore, was not void on its face, and must be held valid as to all the world until it has been determined, at the instance of the state, that the charter has been violated. If they have violated the law of their being, they have committed a wrong, not against any particular individual, but against the state, and this wrong can only be inquired into by a proceeding on the part of the state. Whitman Gold & S. Min. Co. v. Baker, 3 Nev. 386. In other words, the corporation can take property to any amount, but can hold it, as against the state, only to the amount provided by its charter. The contrary doctrine would make it very hazardous to take title from a corporation with such a limitation on its charter, and, if the objection could be made by anyone, title to property once held by such corporations would cease to be marketable, litigation would be promoted, and courts would be constantly called on to decide the very difficult questions of fact as to whether the property of a corporation does or does not exceed in value the charter limits. In the case now before us, the estimates of the witnesses differ greatly, and a devise or bequest would be held valid or void according to the estimate adopted by the court. We think this is one of those cases which may be put in the class with those referred to by the late Justice Miller in his dissenting opinion in Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 293, 33 L. ed. 321, where he says: "I can conceive of cases where corporations have been authorized to acquire a limited amount of real estate, such as the legislature may conceive to be useful and necessary to the purpose for which they are organized, . . . in which the question as to whether they have exceeded that amount . . . may be one for the state alone, and not of any private citizen." Adopting, therefore, the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States in Jones v. Habersham, supra, we will affirm the order appealed from.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Harry A. ORTH et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A letter to testator's wife containing advice as to the management of the estate and expressing a hope that she will convey certain property to a person named and that she will have sufficient after paying debts to assist all his children as they may need from time to time, and expressing full confidence that she will act justly toward all, closing with a desire that she will have a competence during life and then what is left give to all the children alike, does not create any interest in the property in favor of the children, or impose any burden upon the absolute title which is given to her by the will.

2. A trust, whether declared or arising from conduct, which does not with reasonable certainty point the essential elements of a trust, is no trust at all.

NOTE.—For gifts by will as affected by promises made to the testator and by secret trusts, see note to Gore v. Clarke (S. C.) 20 L. R. A. 465.

As to precatory words in a will, see Knox's Appeal (Pa.) 6 L. R. A. 353, and many cases cited in note thereto.

3. The failure to perform a promise made by the sole beneficiary of a will to the testator, to comply with his requests, contained in a letter, that a portion of the property should be used to aid certain other persons, is not such a fraud as will create a trust ex maleficio.

4. A parol promise to a testator by the sole beneficiary of his will to dispose of a portion of the property in favor of another person, is invalid so far as it involves the disposition of real property or of personal property of an amount which comes within the statute of frauds.

On Rehearing.

5. The rule that a trust in personal property may be created by parol cannot be permitted to work a revocation of a will contrary to the requirements of the statute upon that subject.

6. The rule that one who, standing in a fiduciary relation to another, obtains an advantage from him, is presumed to have obtained it fraudulently, does not apply to the case of a testamentary provision by a husband in favor of his wife.

(November 26, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carroll County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce an alleged trust in property given by the will of Godlove S. Orth, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. L. Taylor, T. F. Palmer, John H. Gould, and George R. Eldridge, with Messrs. George Burry and Charles C. Spencer, for appellants:

Where a person knowing that a testator in making a disposition in his favor intends it to be applied for purposes other than his own benefit either expressly promises or by silence implies that he will carry the testator's intention into effect, and the property is left to him upon the faith of that promise or undertaking, it is in effect a case of trust; and in such a case the court will not allow the devisee to set up the statute of frauds, or rather the statute of wills by which the statute of frauds is now in this respect superseded; and for this reason the devisee by his conduct has induced the testator to leave him the property.

Drakeford v. Wilks, 3 Atk. 539; Moss v. Cooper, 1 Johns. & H. 367; Gilpatrick v. Glidden, supra.

It is not necessary that the trustee expressly promise to carry out the trust. As soon as he learns the intention of the testator he is bound to elect and declare whether he will undertake the trust or not. Silence is acquiescence and the trust must be executed.

An agreement entered into upon a supposition of a right or of a doubtful right, though it afterwards comes out that the right was on the other side, shall be binding, and the right shall not prevail against the agreement of the parties; for the right must always be on one side or the other, and therefore the compromise of a doubtful right is a sufficient foundation for an agreement.

On Rehearing.

At common law trusts both of real and personal property could be created by parol, and personal property not being within the statute trusts therein may still be created by parol.

Bispham, Eq. 1893, § 63; 1 Perry, Tr. 1882, § 86; Lewin, Tr. 1888, § 53; Hill, Trustees, 1867, § 57.

The statute of frauds was not made to cover fraud. It has been repeatedly held that this was not the purpose of the statute and that the statute will not be permitted to aid in the perpetration of a fraud. The principle of interpretation is that where there is fraud constructive or actual the want of a writing shall not be set up.

Trusts arising by implication of law are not within the statute, and this is so whether or not they are by the statutes expressly excepted.

Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2969; Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3391; Giffen v. Taylor, 139 Ind. 578; 1 Perry, Tr. 1889, § 137; Hoxie v. Carr, 1 Sumn. 173; Foote v. Bryant, 47 N. Y. 544; Br son v. Brison, supra; Catalani v. Catalani, 124 Ind. 58.

Strictly speaking a so-called "implied trust" raised by a court of equity is not a trust at all. The jurisdiction and relief are founded, not on trust, but on fraud. The so-called "implied trust" is a fiction—a mere name to designate the form of the remedy for the fraud. Neither implied trust nor any subdivision of it is ever properly applied to designate any part of the fraud which is alleged and for which the implied trust is the remedy.

1 Beach, Eq. Jur. 1892, §§ 226, 233; Bispham, Eq. 1893, 151; 1 Perry, Tr. 1889, § 166; Rolfe v. Gregory, 4 De G. J. & S. 576; 2 Lewin, Tr. 1888, 864; Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 607.

The character and limits of the so-called "implied trust" are determined, as are the character and limits of all decrees, by the nature and requirements of the particular case.

Where A gives money or property to B upon B's promise to hold it in whole or in part for C, and B afterwards appropriates the money or property to his own use, a court of equity will in its decree treat B as a trustee.

The only point which is open to debate in cases of this character is whether the facts show such a case of fraud as falls within the exception.

Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 527.

A mere parol contract to hold land in trust, and its breach, are not such fraud as takes a case out of the statute.

1 Perry, Tr. 1889, § 134; Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 145 N. Y. 313; Bispham, Eq. 1893, § 218; Bigelow, Fr. 1888, 483.

The fraud required to take a case out of the statute results from the acts and relations of the parties and not from the agreement and its breach, or rather it results from the grouped and aggregated circumstances, relations, and agreements.

1 Perry, Tr. 1889, § 134; Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, and Brison v. Brison, supra; Foote v. Bryant, 47 N. Y. 547.

Fraud may be divided as follows:

1. Fraud arising from facts and circumstances of imposition. This is sometimes called "real fraud," "active fraud," "actual fraud," "deception," "deceit," or "deception affecting the motive."

1 Bispham, Eq. 1893, §§ 205, 206; 1 Bigelow, Fr. chap. 1, p. 384; Moncrieff, Fr. 1891, 101, 102; 1 Bigelow, Fr. 484; Clark, Cont. 332; Cooley, Torts, 1888, 487; Pollock, Torts, 1887, 241; Bishop, Cont. 1887, § 668; Anson, Cont. 2d ed. 203; Edgington v. Fitzmaurice, L. 2. Fraud which arises from the circumstances, relations, and conditions of the parties. This is sometimes called "constructive fraud." It includes (1) those cases which grow out of "conduct subsequent," and (2) those cases which grow out of a violation of the duties imposed by fiduciary, confidential, and kindred relations of the parties.

Messrs. W. D. Wallace and S. P. Baird, for appellees:

If the failure to perform a parol promise takes every case out of the statute of wills and the statute of frauds their enactment was a useless ceremony.

This distinction between obtaining a will by false and fraudulent promises and the mere failure to keep a parol promise has been repeatedly recognized and enforced by the courts.

Mrs. Orth had full power of disposition of the entire estate; she had the right to appropriate it all to her own use. Upon the death of Orth Mrs. Orth's right in the estate became fixed. She either held it absolutely free from any trust or burdened with a trust. She could not hold it both ways. As she had a right to appropriate it all to her own use she must have held it free from any trust.

A beneficiary of a trust ex maleficio or constructive trust has not an equitable estate in the trust property as a beneficiary of an express trust has. The beneficiary of a trust ex maleficio has but a right of action which will not ripen into an actual estate until the trust has been established by a decree of the court.

Perry, Tr. § 166; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1044; Cooper v. Cockrum, 87 Ind. 443; Bedilian v. Seaton, 3 Wall. Jr. 280.

Therefore whatever right of action William M. Orth might have had in his lifetime upon his death became vested solely in his administrator and not in his heirs.

These trusts are bottomed upon fraud which takes the trust out of the statutes of frauds and wills, and not upon parol agreements which would be within the statutes. The nature, extent, and character of the trusts therefore are measured and determined by what property was intercepted and diverted from the complainants to the defendants by the fraud of the latter.

In the case at bar there is no averment that Orth ever even evinced a desire to make any will other than the one he left, much less are we informed what provision he would have made for any of his children, but for the alleged promises of his wife.

The alleged trust is created and defined, if defined at all, solely by agreement, not by any act of commission or omission.

Even if the complaint had alleged that the promises of Mrs. Orth were false and fraudulent, and that she had no intention at the time that they were made of carrying them out, the complaint would not under the decisions of this court be sufficient.

Hayes v. Burkam, Salter v. Bird, and Bedilian v. Seaton, supra.

There could be no right of action against Mrs. Orth or her estate for breach of the alleged parol agreement made between her and William M. Orth. Such an agreement would be void under the statute of frauds.

Wallace v. Long, and Austin v. Davis, supra.

To permit any of the provisions of a will, duly executed and attested as required by law, to be changed or modified by parol evidence of promises made by a devisee, would strike down the statute in reference to the revocation of wills and lead to the most disastrous frauds.

There is no cause of action stated on the alleged parol agreement between Mrs. Orth and William M. Orth.

1. Such an agreement would be void under the statute of frauds.

Wallace v. Long, and Austin v. Davis, supra.

2. If such an agreement were valid it would not create a trust. No property was obtained on the faith of it. There is nothing but a promise and breach thereof alleged, for which a right of action for damages would accrue to William M. Orth against the estate of Mrs. Orth and, as her estate was settled, the action is barred.

The allegation that Harry A. Orth and Mary Orth McNutt, by appealing to the maternal feelings of their mother, prevented her from executing a will in favor of William M. Orth, does not create any liability against them or in favor of William M. Orth or his representatives.

Hackney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The late Hon. Godlove S. Orth, by his last will, devised and bequeathed to Mary Ann Orth, who was his second wife, all of his real and personal property, without condition, reservation, or limitation. Bearing the date of said will, and accompanying the same, was this letter from the testator to his said wife:

To My Dear Wife:

Among my papers you will find my will of this date. I give and bequeath to you all my property, real and personal. I do this because it will greatly facilitate the settlement of my estate, will tend to save unnecessary costs and expenses, and will give you, if properly managed, a competence during your life, and something for each of the children, Will, Mollie, and Hal., thereafter. After the payment of all my debts, I trust you will have sufficient left to assist all my children as they may need from time to time, without however, endangering your own support, and I have full confidence that you will act justly towards all. Unfortunately, as you know, I am heavily in debt, but by prudent management, I think, you can save our Benton county farms or at least the 640 acres, being in section 12, and selling if necessary, the two 80-acre tracts in section 1. The two houses occupied by W. M. Orth and Jos. Ewing are now held by us jointly, and on my death will become your property without the will. I should like very much, and hope you will, as soon as you find you can safely do it, make a deed to my granddaughter Lizzie Ray Orth, for the house now occupied by her father. This will furnish them with a home. Our land in Bollinger county, Missouri, is also held by us jointly, and after my death will belong to you without the will. Some of my creditors may want their money sooner than you can realize by sale of property. In such event I advise you to borrow money by giving mortgage on some of my property, but I would advise you not to mortgage your own property for any such purpose. Unless I am much mistaken, the rents from the city property and farms will always be more than sufficient to pay taxes and interest on my debts; but of course, it will be good policy to sell property as fast as you can conveniently, without sacrifice, and apply proceeds to the payment of my debts. Whenever you can sell any of your own property, especially that which is unproductive, I advise you to do so, and apply proceeds to the payment of my debts, thus relieving the property which by the will becomes yours, of the debts against the same. I do not think it necessary to administer on the estate. You can settle without it, I think. But, should it become necessary, you can take out letters yourself, or join some good friend with you. You will need advice. Hal. will, of course, be on hand, besides others whom you may regard as trustworthy. Do not pay my debts until a full examination, for it might so happen that claims will be presented through mistake or otherwise, or without proper credits allowed. In my papers you will generally find receipts and memoranda in reference to all my business affairs. Have all these carefully examined. In a word, act carefully, prudently, and under such good advice as you can procure, and act justly towards yourself and towards all my children, and I shall be content. My desire in this matter is that all my debts be paid, that you have a competence during your life, and then, what is left, give to all the children alike. Farewell.

Godlove S. Orth.

In December, 1882, he departed this life, leaving surviving him his widow, said Mary Ann Orth, who elected to take under the will; Harry A. Orth and Mary Orth McNutt, his children by said Mary Ann; and William M. Orth, a son by his former wife. Since the death of the testator said Mary Ann Orth and William M. Orth have departed this life intestate. Harry A. Orth is administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the estate of said testator, and is administrator of the estate of said Mary Ann Orth. William M. Orth left surviving, as his only heirs, the appellants, Eliza Gertrude Orth, his widow, and Lizzie Ray Orth, his daughter; and the appellant Spencer is administrator of said William's estate. Said appellants instituted this suit, in eight paragraphs of complaint, against the appellees, Mary Orth McNutt and Harry A. Orth, personally and as administrator of said two estates of his father and his mother. Harry A. Orth and Mary Orth McNutt severally demurred to each paragraph of the complaint, stating as causes of demurrer that neither paragraph stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that several causes of action were improperly joined. Harry A. Orth, in his capacity as administrator de bonis non, demurred separately to each paragraph of complaint; stating as causes of demurrer a want of sufficient facts, a want of jurisdiction over his person, and a want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. Pending the demurrers the plaintiffs dismissed their action as to the estate of Mary Ann Orth, and thereupon the court sustained said several demurrers to the several paragraphs of complaint. Upon that ruling arise the only questions for review.

The first paragraph of complaint alleged the execution of the will and of said letter, both of which were exhibited by reference, and alleged that Mary Ann Orth knew the contents of said letter, and promised said Godlove to carry out the requests and intention expressed in said letter; that said Godlove during his last illness would have made other provisions in favor of said William, but that Mary Ann, Harry A., and Mary O. conspired to deprive William of any interest in the estate, and did, by promises and protestations, dissuade said Godlove from making changes in his will, and that they did during his last sickness exclude from his room and bedside the friends of William, and persons who might secure a change in said will; that a few days before his death said Godlove called to his bedside his said wife and his three children, and in the presence in each and all of them, had said wife and said Harry A. and Mary O. to promise to carry out the wishes expressed in said letter. It is also alleged that parts of the estate were converted by Mary Ann Orth, and parts were made over to and converted by said Harry A. and Mary O.; that Mary A., when executrix, and Harry A., as administrator de bonis non, made no inventory and no accounting to the court of the assets of the estate, or any disposition of the same. An accounting and partition are prayed, upon the theory that the letter and the oral promises created a trust in favor of William M. in the property of the estate of his father. The second paragraph alleges substantially the same facts, but adds that after the death of Godlove S. Orth his widow, Mary Ann Orth, stated to William M. Orth that she was intending and endeavoring to treat all the children alike, according to the expressed wishes of his father, that pursuant to that expressed intention and her promise, she procured a will to be written which to some extent would carry out such wishes; that said Harry A. and Mary O., further contriving to defraud William of that portion of the estate of his father which after the death of Mary Ann would rightfully belong to him or his heirs, by importunities, and by appealing to the maternal feeling of said Mary Ann Orth in an improper manner, before and during her last sickness, postponed from time to time the execution of such will until Mary Ann Orth died without making provision for said William. By this paragraph damages are sought. The third paragraph differs from the first in alleging a promise by Mary Ann Orth to William Orth, after the death of Godlove S. Orth, to carry out the wishes expressed in said letter, and frequent requests by William M. that she do so, and that she died having neglected to comply with that promise. Damages are claimed by this paragraph. The fourth paragraph pleads the facts alleged in the second paragraph, but upon the theory of a trust, as in the first paragraph, seeks an accounting and partition. The fifth paragraph alleges substantially the facts pleaded in the first, second, and third paragraphs, and demands an accounting and partition. The sixth paragraph differs from the third in alleging that the promise of Mary Ann Orth to William M. to carry out the wishes of his father as expressed in said letter was induced by a threat of said William to sue her for the enforcement of his claim, and that by reason of her said promise, and in consideration thereof, he desisted from suing as he had intended. An accounting and partition were prayed. The seventh paragraph alleged the facts of the sixth, and, instead of an accounting and partition, sought damages. The eighth paragraph was the same as the sixth, omitting the allegation that William M. Orth withheld suit in consideration of the promise of Mary Ann Orth to provide for him, and that she had died without executing her will. In addition to the facts pleaded in the sixth paragraph, it was alleged that Harry A. and Mary O. wrongfully converted to themselves the property of Godlove S. Orth remaining at the death of Mary Ann Orth. The demand was for damages. The complaint covers 90 pages of typewritten legal cap, and the paragraphs differ so slightly that we have deemed it advisable to state them briefly, rather than to set them out at length.

Our statute of wills (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2746, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2576) provides that "no will, except a nuncupative will, shall affect any estate unless it be in writing, signed by the testator, or by some one in his presence with his consent, and attested and subscribed in his presence by two or more competent witnesses." It would seem unnecessary to remark that this provision is wise, in its purpose to require the solemn and almost sacred disposition of property by testament to exclude unauthentic writings, the possible subjects of forgery, and evidence of parol declarations of devise and bequest, the possible subjects of false testimony. The letter of the testator, if it contained testamentary words, has not the attestation required by the statute to entitle it to recognition as his will, nor does it carry even the force of recognition by any reference from within the lines of the will. It is not acknowledged as required in the case of deeds, even if that should be sufficient, and has no other authentic protection from the rule guarding against forged instruments of title. We do not regard the letter as of a testamentary character. See McCarty v. Waterman, 84 Ind. 550; Moore v. Stephens, 97 Ind. 271. Indeed, we do not understand counsel to insist that by it William M. Orth became a devisee or legatee, but it may possibly be considered in determining the intention of the testator in the provisions made by his will. Copeland v. Summers, 138 Ind. 219, and 226. In so receiving it, however, we should be mindful of the rule that the authentic provisions of the testament itself are recognized by the statute as the most worthy source of information as to the testator's intention, and that, where the intention there manifested is without uncertainty or doubt, we should be slow to permit doubt or uncertainty to thrust itself into the will, and thwart that clearly expressed and otherwise certain intention. The only disposition of property made by the will was in the following language: "I do hereby devise and bequeath to my wife, Mary Ann Orth, in fee simple, all and singular, my real estate of whatsoever nature or description, situate in Tippecanoe, Benton and White counties, Indiana, all of my real estate in the states of Iowa and Missouri, or wheresoever else situated, and of which I may die seised and possessed. And I do further give, devise, and bequeath to my wife, Mary Ann Orth, absolutely, all of my personal estate, of whatever nature or description, which may be owned by me at the time of my death. I hereby grant to my said wife full power, either with or without administration on my estate, to collect all my debts and choses in action, and to do whatever may be necessary in the final settlement of my estate, hereby enjoining upon her to pay all just debts and liabilities as soon after my death as may be. Should administration on my estate be necessary or desirable, I hereby appoint my said wife executrix of this my last will and testament, giving her authority to associate one or more persons with her in the execution of this trust. I desire all of my dear children to know and feel that this disposition of my estate is in my judgment the best, under all the circumstances surrounding it, knowing that they will find my said wife as much disposed to love and care for them, and to deal justly by them, as I have always felt and acted towards them myself."

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to conceive or to reduce to words a more sweeping and unfettered disposition of property, or a clearer or more certain designation of the object of the bounty. Mary Ann Orth was given in fee simple all of the real estate, and was given absolutely all of the personal property. Consider the letter as if it followed these unambiguous declarations of intention to vest in the wife the fullest title known to the law, and we will determine its legal and equitable effect. We have already seen that it does not arise to the standard of a testament, and we are now to look at it to ascertain if it bespeaks the testator's intention to have encumbered the devise and bequest with a trust in favor of his children. Almost the first words of the letter, which is addressed to his wife, are: "I give and bequeath to you all my property, real and personal." She is advised of his financial embarrassment, and in a practical, thoroughly business like course, she is advised how to take the best advantage of the embarrassment. In this advice the intention is repeated that her title and holding are unqualified, for he suggests that of her property, not received by devise, she sell that which is unproductive, paying his debts with the proceeds, and "thus relieving the property which by the will becomes yours." There is no word of command in the letter, but its tone is entirely advisory. True there are expressions of hope, of confidence, and of request. The hope is that his indebtedness may not sweep away the estate, and leave the wife without support during her life, without means to help his children from time to time as they may need it, and without something which she may at the end give to his children; the confidence, that she will so help his children from time to time, and finally, "what is left, give to all the children alike;" the request, that she convey to William's daughter, Lizzie Ray Orth, as a home for William's family, a house and lot belonging to the wife independently of the will. There is not a syllable expressing the intention to charge the estate devised with an enforceable legal or equitable trust in favor of the children. There is that which, from various expressions, denotes a confiding trust in the wife that she will deal fairly, justly, and equitably with his children. That trust raises but a moral obligation, and creates no interest in the property in favor of the children, and does not burden the absolute title given by the will to the wife. In 1 Lewin on Trusts, ed. 1888, p. 135, it is said: "Where both objects and property are certain, yet no trust will arise if the testator expressly declare that the language is not to be deemed imperative, or the construing it a trust would be a contradiction to the terms in which the preceding bequest is given; or if, all circumstances considered, it is more probable that the testator meant to communicate a mere discretion; . . . or if a testator give the property to his wife, 'well knowing her sense of justice and love to her family, and feelingiperfect confidence that she will manage the same to the best advantage for the benefit of her children' [or 'to be used by her in such ways and means as she may consider best for her own benefit and that of my three children;' or 'feeling confident that she will act justly to our children in dividing the same when no longer required by her;' or 'in full confidence that she will do what is right as to the disposal thereof between my children, either in her lifetime, or by will after her decease']; or 'to be at her disposal in any way she may think best for the benefit of herself and family;' [or 'to his wife absolutely, with full power for her to dispose of the same as she may think fit for the benefit of his family, having full confidence that she will do so.'"] We cite in support of the text the following decisions: Harper v. Phelps, 21 Conn. 257; McCreary v. Burns, 17 S. C. 45; Colton v. Colton, 21 Fed. Rep. 594; Foose v. Whitmore, 82 N. Y. 405, 37 Am. Rep. 572; Hopkins v. Glunt, 111 Pa. 287; McIntyre v. McIntyre, 123 Pa. 329; Howard v. Carusi, 109 U. S. 725, 27 L. ed. 1089; Rose v. Porter, 141 Mass. 309. There should be no confusion of the expression of the testator of confidence that his wife at her death would provide for the children, with the absolute devises and bequests of the will, so as to possibly imply a life estate rather than a fee simple in the wife. No such contention is made by the appellants, but the one inquiry arising from the letter is, Does it point a trust in the property devised, or bespeak the testator's intention to raise a trust in favor of his children? Very clearly, we think, it does not. But, while considering it as if a part of the will, suppose its terms were more obscure and doubtful than we have regarded them, and that they should make the question doubtful as to whether the testator intended to narrow the otherwise free and unfettered devise and bequest. Our duty would then be to disregard the doubt, and adhere to the clearly-expressed provisions as indicating the intention of the testator. As said in the recent case of Ross v. Ross, 135 Ind. 367: "Where an estate in fee is devised in one clause of a will, in clear and decisive terms, it cannot be taken away or cut down, by raising a doubt upon a subsequent clause, nor by inference therefrom, nor by any subsequent words that are not as clear and decisive as the words of the clause giving the estate in fee. Bailey v. Sanger, 108 Ind. 264; O'Boyle v. Thomas, 116 Ind. 243." The case of Fullenwider v. Watson, 113 Ind. 18, involves the two questions as to considering the effect of words of recommendation, and excluding those merely casting doubt upon provisions otherwise clearly made. There the will gave to the wife, by decisive words, the personal estate, but followed the words of bequest with the following: "To have, use, and enjoy the same as she may choose, and to dispose of the same in such manner as she may desire; yet I request that if, at the time of her decease, any of the personal property shall remain undisposed of, it be given to the children of my son, . . . and the children of my daughter. . . . " This court said of the bequest: "We are very far within the authorities when we affirm the proposition that, where a bequest of personal property, without limitation to life or particular use, is made, and is accompanied by an absolute power of disposition, the first taker takes the whole interest. It has been for centuries the rule that, where the whole estate is absolutely devised, a repugnant condition must yield. Allen v. Craft, 109 Ind. 476, 58 Am. Rep. 425. But here there is no condition, for the words employed are words of recommendation, not words of condition or restriction, and the case is within the rule declared by the adjudged cases. Van Gorder v. Smith, 99 Ind. 404; Stowell v. Hastings, 59 Vt. 494, 59 Am. Rep. 748; Howard v. Carusi, supra; Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 148; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1070."

Considered as a rule for ascertaining the intention of the testator, there is no room to distinguish between bequests of personal property and devises of real estate. The force of the letter in the creation of a trust certainly gains no strength by considering it apart from the will, where it must stand, and where, as we have said, the courts should be slow to accept it, in the face of the statutes of wills, of trusts, and of frauds, as impairing the force of solemn testamentary provisions made in conformity to the statutes. Appellants' learned counsel strenuously insist that they do not set up the letter as creating the trust upon which they rely, but insist that the trust which they would enforce, and for the violation of which they seek damages, is a trust ex maleficio, or a constructive trust arising from the fraudulent conduct of Mrs. Orth subsequent to the execution of the will. The position of counsel is stated by them in a quotation, supplemented by the authorities they cite, which we take from their brief: "Where a person, knowing that a testator, in making a disposition in his favor, intends it to be applied for purposes other than his own benefit, either expressly promises, or by silence implies, that he will carry the testator's intention into effect, and the property is left to him upon the faith of that promise or undertaking, it is in effect a case of trust; and in such a case the court will not allow the devisee to set up the statute of frauds,—or rather the statute of wills, by which the statute of frauds is now, in this respect, superseded,—and for this reason: The devisee, by his conduct, has induced the testator to leave him the property, and, as Lord Justice Turner says in Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204, 'no one can doubt that, if these defendants had stated that he would not carry out the intentions of this testator, this disposition in their favor would not have been found in this will.' But in this the court does not violate the spirit of the statute, but for the same end, namely, prevention of fraud, it ingrafts the trust on the devise, by admitting evidence which the statute would in terms exclude, in order to prevent the party from applying the property to a purpose foreign to that for which he undertook to hold it." Rockwood's Case (1636) 1 Cro. Eliz. 164; Chamberlaine v. Chamberlaine (1678) Freem. Ch. 34; Thynn v. Thynn (1684) 1 Vern. 296; Devenish v. Baines (1689) 1 Prec. in Ch. 3; Oldham v. Litchfield (1705) 2 Vern. 506; Drakeford v. Wilks (1747) 3 Atk. 539; Reech v. Kennegal (1748) 1 Ves. If the position so assumed were correct, and if the authorities cited could be held to apply under the statutory provisions in this state concerning wills, trusts, and frauds,—questions upon which we now venture no opinion,—it is nevertheless true that, upon the allegations of any paragraph of the complaint, the letter is read to define the limits and character of the trust. It is from the letter that the subject of the trust insisted upon is to be taken; it is from the letter that the objects of the trust must be learned; it is from the letter that the time and manner of performance of the trust shall be determined, if at all. No promise of Mrs. Orth to her husband is alleged which did not have reference to his wishes as expressed in the letter. No promise of Mrs. Orth to William is alleged which did not have reference to the wishes of his father as expressed in the letter. The alleged promises to William after the death of his father, however, do not constitute an element in the creation of a trust, if a trust was created, but from the standpoint of the appellants, may possibly be considered in determining whether Mrs. Orth violated the alleged promises to her husband.

The important question, involving the letter, is that, as we have said, it must be accepted as defining the scope of the trust claimed. The oral promises constituting the alleged fraud,—the essence of the trust ex maleficio,—considered apart from the letter, would be meaningless, since those promises were but generally to carry out the wishes expressed in the letter. The alleged oral promises, without the letter, do not define the extent of the property to be regarded as the subject of the trust, nor the interest to be held for the several alleged beneficiaries, nor the time when the trust obligations should be discharged. In a word, there was nothing definite, in the conversation alleged as to any element of a trust, unless possibly it was as to the persons hoped to be benefited. If we are correct in our conclusions that the letter raises no trust, and does not limit or qualify the absolute devise and bequest to Mrs. Orth; if it gives to the appellants no legal or equitable interest in the property, and does not supply the alleged trust, as appellants expressly affirm in their able briefs; and if it must be looked to as defining the trust claimed to arise from the alleged fraud of Mrs. Orth,—we find that the same uncertainty and indefiniteness attend the alleged trust ex maleficio with the letter as without it. We apprehend that authority should not be required to support the proposition that a trust, whether declared or arising from conduct, which does not with reasonable certainty point the essential elements of a trust, is no trust at all. The rule stated by Lewin (page 56) is: "Nor will the trust be executed if the precise nature of the trust cannot be ascertained." We do not understand the appellants to maintain that, as a rule of equity, Mrs. Orth should have been punished, or that her children shall now be punished, to the extent of giving up all of the property devised, because of her fraud or their fraud. Nor is it more reasonable that because of fraud, if such it be, without being able to ascertain and define the nature and extent of the trust which the testator may have had in mind, a court of equity should affix the punishment at a sum equal to one third of the property devised, and confer it upon William's heirs. If we are unable to ascertain the nature and extent of the trust intended, we are powerless to enforce it, and are unauthorized to gauge it to meet the ordinary rules of equality. As already indicated, the letter creates no trust, the parol promises create no trust, and the letter and the promises together, so far from creating a trust, but constitute the promise to perform in the future a duty neither legal nor equitable. Does this breach of duty work such fraud and injustice as to require that equity shall construct a trust in behalf of the heirs of the testator? If it does, equity will be required, contrary to the views of the appellant, and contrary to our view of the effect of the letter, to go to the letter, and from it frame the terms and conditions of the trust, and supplement them with the oral promise creating it, and ingraft both upon the will, to its overthrow. But we are not willing to concede that the fraud is such as to raise a trust ex maleficio. Such a trust, in its very nature, implies the absence of an intention on the part of the parties to create a trust by their own expression, for it would be but to repeal the statute of trusts (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 3391; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2969), forbidding the creation by parol of a trust concerning lands, to permit the parties, after declaring a parol trust and violating it, to then plead that violation as the fraud calling for the equitable construction of that particular trust. "Constructive trusts include all those instances in which a trust is raised by the doctrines of equity for the purpose of working out justice in the most efficient manner, where there is no intention of the parties to create such a relation, and in most cases contrary to the intention of the one holding the legal title, and where there is no express or implied, written or verbal, declaration of the trust." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1044; Perry, Tr. § 166; Pillow v. Brown, 26 Ark.

240; Hollinshead v. Simms, 51 Cal. 158; McLane v. Johnson, 43 Vt. 48; Thompson v. Thompson, 16 Wis. 92; Collins v. Collins, 6 Lans. 368; Griffith v. Godey, 113 U. S. 89, 28 L. ed. 934; Lewin, Tr. p. 180, note 1; Mescall v. Tully, 91 Ind. 96; Wright v. Mooty, 116 Ind. 175. There are, perhaps, cases where parol trusts, ineffectual under the statute, have been procured by such fraud and deceit as that equity will grant relief for the fraud, without regard to the declared trust; but such cases do not proceed upon the idea that equity enforces the trust which is inhibited by the statute, but rather upon the idea that equity constructs a trust. If Mrs. Orth, by fraud, had procured the execution of the will in this case, equity would have held her a trustee for the benefit of those entitled by law to the property. Possibly, if the testator had, after the execution of his will, manifested a desire to create a specific legal trust in behalf of his children, and Mrs. Orth had, by fraud, dissuaded him, equity would have ridden over the fraud, and established a trust on the terms of such legal trust. Here we have no showing that Mrs. Orth procured the will to be written in the present form, nor have we allegations of an intention on the part of the testator, subsequent to the execution of the will, to execute another and different will, including, specifically or generally, a trust of the character of that here claimed. Nor have we allegations of a desire on his part to execute any valid separate instrument declaring such a trust. It is alleged generally that Mrs. Orth "dissuaded the said Godlove from making changes in his said will in favor of the said William M. Orth, or making other provisions for him which he would otherwise have done;" but it is nowhere alleged that the testator expressed a desire to, and was by fraud dissuaded from making, a trust such as that here sought to be constructed upon equitable rules. While the complaint is probably subject to the objection of appellees' counsel, that it does not allege the acts constituting any fraud claimed to have been exercised, we need not condemn the pleading on that ground; but, giving the pleading the most favorable construction in behalf of the appellants, the fraud of Mrs. Orth consisted in failing to comply with the requests contained in the letter, having promised her husband that she would comply with them. This, we say, is not such fraud as equity would accept as sufficient to require the construction of the trust here insisted upon. In 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 52, it is said: "There is a sharp conflict among the authorities as to what constitutes such fraud as will justify the admission of parol evidence to establish a trust in favor of the grantor. The earlier English cases were very liberal in admitting such evidence; but the current of modern authority is to the effect that parol evidence is not admissible to show an agreement to hold property in trust where it is conveyed by a deed absolute on its face, unless the instrument was obtained by fraud or was made absolute by mistake. In other words, while the refusal to execute or acknowledge such trust may constitute fraud, in a certain sense, it is not such fraud as will render parol evidence admissible to establish the trust. Any other rule would make the statute of frauds practically ineffective. But where there is fraud in obtaining the conveyance, or in the means used to secure its execution in the particular form in which it is drawn, or where, by accident, or mistake, it fails to express the real intention of the parties, parol evidence may be admitted for the purpose of affording relief to the injured party." To these propositions many authorities are cited. In Jackson v. Myers, 120 Ind. 504, and 511,—a suit to enforce a parol promise to convey lands,—it was said: "Conceding that he was morally bound to execute a conveyance without demand therefor, his failure so to do would not constitute fraud. To so hold would be to abolish all distinction between fraud and breach of contract." In Fouty v. Fouty, 34 Ind. 433,—a suit for like purpose,—it was said: "Representations upon which fraud can be predicated must be of an existing fact, or of a fact alleged to exist, and not a mere promise to do something afterwards." Richter v. Irwin, 28 Ind. 26, presented a like question, and was decided in the same way. So in Peterson v. Boswell, 137 Ind. 211. But it is insisted by appellants that there is a distinction between deeds and wills, as to the fraud necessary to construct a trust. It is probably true, upon the English cases, that where a testator has by his will made an absolute devise, and subsequently has formulated, in writing or by parol, a trust which he desires to ingraft upon such devise, or desires to make a new will expressing such trust, and is by the fraudulent representations and promises of the devisee prevented or wrongfully dissuaded from doing so, equity would construct that trust, and deny the devisee the fruits of the fraud perpetrated. This may be true as to a will, but could not be true as to a deed, because, in the first such trust can be ingrafted, and in the last all control has passed from the grantor. We have already shown that we have here no case parallel to that of the testator just supposed, nor have we any reason for concluding that the same conduct following the execution of a will should be more effective as a fraud and in raising a trust ex maleficio, than if it had been exerted to procure the execution of a deed, and is followed, as in the case of the will, with the mere omission or refusal to execute the parol promise. That the parol promise of one to convey to another in the event of a conveyance to him will not, upon refusal to comply, take the case out of the statute of trusts, has frequently been decided by this court. Peterson v. Boswell, and Fouty v. Fouty, supra; Montgomery v. Craig, 128 Ind. 48; Pearson v. Pearson, 125 Ind. 341; Wright v. Moody, supra; Mescall v. Tully, 91 Ind. 96; Rooker v. Rooker, 75 Ind. 571; Irwin v. Ivers, 7 Ind. 308, 63 Am. Dec. 420. In Sands v. Thompson, 43 Ind., on page 28, this court quotes with approval the following extract from Browne on the Statute of Frauds: "Sec. 439. The fraud against which equity will relieve, notwithstanding the statute, is not the mere moral wrong of repudiating a contract actually entered into, but which, by reason of the statute, the party is not bound to perform for want of its being in writing. This was clearly laid down by Lord Macclesfield, Chancellor, in a case arising upon a promise of a defendant, about to marry, that his wife should enjoy all her own estate, to her separate use after the marriage, which promise, as one made 'upon consideration of marriage,' could not regularly be enforced. His lordship declared that 'in cases of fraud, equity should relieve, even against the words of the statute, as if one agreement in writing should be proposed and drawn, and another fraudulently and secretly brought in and executed in lieu of the former; in this or such like cases of fraud, equity would relieve; but where there is no fraud, only relying upon the honor, word, or promise of the defendant, the statute making those promises void, equity will not interfere.' " Irwin v. Hubbard, 49 Ind. 350 (see page 355), 19 Am. Rep. 679; Hayes v. Burkam, 51 Ind. 130; Mescall v. Tully, supra; Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522, 55 Am. Rep. 222; Green v. Groves, 109 Ind. 519; Pearson v. Pearson, supra; Stonehill v. Swartz, 129 Ind. 310.

Upon the assumption that the letter, with the parol promise to comply with the wishes therein expressed, constitutes a contract to provide for William M. Orth, by the will of Mrs. Orth, the case of Wallace v. Long, supra, is pertinent, not only upon the question of fraud, but also upon the question of the recovery of damages by his heirs for a violation of any such contract. In that case a child had gone into the family of Fette, to live with and as a member of such family, upon the parol promise of Fette that, if she would so live with his family during the lives of himself and his wife, "they would treat and deal with and towards her as their child, they would make her their heir, and at their death, or at the death of the survivor of the two, they would will, bequeath, and give her the entire estate of which they were possessed." She remained in the family, complying with her part of the contract, until Fette and wife had both died, they having made no provision by will or otherwise for the child. This court, speaking by Mitchell, J., said: "The evidence in this case tends to support the view that it was the purpose of the intestate to make provision for the plaintiff's ward by will, may be conceded, but as the agreement to do so was never manifested in writing, signed by her, and as it involved an agreement for the sale of real estate, and for the transfer of personal property exceeding in value $50, such agreement was subject to the operation of the statute of frauds, equally with all other agreements for like sales. Because the agreement was not withdrawn from the operation of the statute by part performance, it cannot be specifically enforced, neither can it be the foundation of an action for damages." So with relation to the obligation supposed to exist from the letter and parol promise to assist William from time to time, and to convey to William's daughter the house and lot in which he lived with his family. However as to these elements of the alleged promises, there is no charge of violation by Mrs. Orth, and should be considered neither as supplying an element in the alleged fraud nor of the claim for damages. Another line of decisions in this state is probably violated by the claim of the appellants, and that is that equity will not enforce, in behalf of a mere volunteer, an executory parol trust. Noe v. Roll, 134 Ind. 115; Peterson v. Boswell, Stonehill v. Swartz, Pearson v. Pearson, and Wright v. Moody, supra; Gaylord v. Lafayette, 115 Ind. 423; Mescall v. Tully, supra; Dunn v. Dunn, 82 Ind. 42; Fouty v. Fouty, and Irwin v. Ivers, supra. If any of these cases were correctly decided, the case falls within the rule suggested. However, we do not rest our decision upon this suggestion, but adhere to the rules which directly affect the principal questions in the case.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Howard, J.:

I concur in the decision reached by the court in this case. I think the record shows that the testator, in devising his property to his wife, did not thereby create a trust in favor of any of his children, but that he gave his property, without reservation, to her, relying upon her judgment and discretion to do with it as might seem best. He indicated to her what he thought would be best, but the discretion to act in the matter was wholly left to her. It is evident that he was not clear in his own mind as to what should be done. The future might make that plain, and he left the matter in her hands, asking her, as she promised, to do what should be right when the time came for her to act. That she might be able to exercise this discretion, the property was given absolutely to her. There was no trust imposed upon it. In so far, however, if at all, as the opinion holds that one who, without consideration paid, receives title to real estate, under promise to reconvey, may afterwards refuse to convey, and justify such refusal under cover of the statute against frauds, I must dissent. There is a well-recognized exception to the application of the statute, namely, that one cannot seek to justify his own fraud by a plea of the statute against frauds. A court of equity will not hear him make such a plea. Attempts to retain possession of property received with a promise to reconvey will also be overthrown, on the ground that the conveyance was without consideration. In any event, a court of equity will seek to do justice, within the lines of law, and will not sanction so gross a perversion of a statute enacted to prevent injustice. See Baird v. Baird, 145 N. Y. 659, 28 L. R. A. 375; Davis v. Whitehead [1894] 2 Ch. 133; also 6 Chicago L. J. 562, 720.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, in response to which Hackney, Ch. J., on May 28, 1896, filed the following opinion:

One contention on behalf of the appellants is that at common law a parol trust in personal property was permitted, and that, as our statute of trusts relates to real estate alone, they have maintained their claim to a trust in the personal estate of the testator, alleged to have been of the value of $100,000. It may be conceded that at common law a trust in personal property may be created by parol. Bispham, Eq. § 63; 1 Perry, Tr. § 86; Lewin, Tr. § 53; Hill, Trustees, § 57. Our statute of trusts and powers probably does not deny the common-law rule in this respect. But in this case the controversy is as to whether the testator, who made a plain and unequivocal devise of his personal estate to his wife, did in any manner not forbidden by law revoke that devise, and create a new disposition of said estate.

Revocation cannot be made except by intentionally destroying the will, or by the execution of a writing, subscribed and attested in manner as required in the execution of wills. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2729 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2559). Certainly, a partial revocation, or an amendment by way of codicil, falls within this statutory rule. The rule with relation to precatory trusts, so fully fortified by the authorities cited in the original opinion, recognizes no distinction between real and personal property. The rule which denies force to language relied upon to cut down an unequivocal disposition of property, unless it clearly and unmistakably discloses the testator's intention to do so, admits of no distinction between devises and bequests. The rule which forbids evidence in parol to contradict instruments of writing knows no difference between writings as to real and those as to personal property. To our minds it seems clear that no question arises in this case as to the power to create a trust in personal property by parol. The question is as to a method of destroying the force of a valid testamentary disposition of such property. If no will exists, it is doubtful if the letter and the promise of Mrs. Orth as to the personal property would avoid the statute of frauds and perjuries (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6635; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4910). Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 522. But of this we need not decide.

It is further contended that the rule that one occupying a fiduciary relation to another, and obtaining an advantage by reason of that relation, is presumed to have obtained that advantage fraudulently, applies in this case. We are not prepared to sanction the doctrine that a devise to the wife by her husband is presumptively fraudulent, and that, therefore, equity will charge the property with a trust in favor of those who may stand in the relation of heirs. The rule stated by the learned counsel for appellants exists, but it has never been applied, so far as our observation and researches have disclosed, to the case of a testamentary provision by a husband for his wife, in the absence of fraud, undue influence, or some positive advantage taken to induce the husband, against his free will, to make such provision. That a man shall make liberal provision for his wife is not unnatural, but is a duty. That Godlove S. Orth should have given his whole property, in his financially embarrassed condition, to his wife, in the hope that, by prudence and careful management, and the disposition of her separate property, she might save from the wreck something, first of all, for her maintenance, was not unnatural, nor suggestive of undue influence or overreaching. See Montgomery v. Craig, 128 Ind. 48.

The questions to which we have referred were not argued upon the original hearing, nor was the further contention that the trust sought to be enforced was such as the statute of trusts and powers excepted from its operation as a constructive or implied trust. The latter contention we regard as in conflict with the position originally assumed, as disclosed by our former opinion. We do not, therefore, consider that contention.

Having again considered the questions originally passed upon, and finding no sufficient reason to reverse the conclusions there reached, the petition for a rehearing is overruled.

PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO, & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Ind.....)

The father of an illegitimate child has no right of action for the child's death under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 237, giving a father a right of action for the death of a "child," although the mother is dead and the child had been acknowledged by the father and had no guardian or next of kin except him.

(April 2, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's illegitimate child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. H. Montgomery and J. B. Brown for appellant.

Mr. S. Stansifer, for appellee:

It is only by virtue of our statute that an action for death can be maintained.

Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Tindall, 13 Ind. 366, 74 Am. Dec. 259; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Vining, 27 Ind. 513, 92 Am. Dec. 269; Mayhew v. Burns, 103 Ind. 328; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wright, 134 Ind. 509.

Even adoption under the statute does not make the adoptive parent a "father" or "mother" within the meaning of the terms of section 266.

The common law did not even take notice of adoption as giving one any permanent family rights.

Cooley, Torts, 42; Broom, Legal Maxims, 7th ed. 515.

There being no right of action for death at common law, it follows that the death statute must be strictly construed.

Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Keely, 23 Ind. 133; Stewart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 103 Ind. 44; Hecht v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 132 Ind. 512; Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co. 141 Ind. 443.

The adoptive father cannot inherit from the child and an adopted child cannot inherit from the widow of the adoptive father. Indeed, the legislature has no power to make an adopted child a natural child.

Krug v. Davis, 87 Ind. 590; Isenhour v. Isenhour, 52 Ind. 328; Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 274, 50 Am. Rep. 788.

If the words of a statute are subject to two different meanings, the court will adopt that sense which will not lead to an absurdity.

Jeffersonville v. Weems, 5 Ind. 547.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this action against ap-

pellee under § 266, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 267), to recover damages for the death of a minor, alleging in his complaint that said deceased was his son. Appellee filed an answer alleging, in substance, that the deceased was a bastard, begotten and born out of wedlock, and that appellant never married the mother of said deceased, and never adopted him by the order of any court. A demurrer for want of facts, to this answer, was overruled. To this answer appellant filed a reply alleging, in substance, that the allegations of said answer are true, but that the deceased was his illegitimate child, and that, when but six months old, appellant received him from his mother, and relieved her of his care and custody, and acknowledged him as his son, and afterwards discharged every duty as a parent towards him, and received from him all the services, obedience, and respect due from a legitimate son; that his mother abandoned him, and is deceased; that said deceased son has no guardian or next of kin, except only appellant. To this reply appellee filed a demurrer for want of facts, which was sustained. Appellant refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered in favor of appellee. The errors assigned call in question the action of the court in overruling appellant's demurrer to the answer, and in sustaining appellee's demurrer to the reply.

Section 266, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 267), upon which this action is predicated, is as follows: "A father, or in case of his death or desertion of his family or imprisonment the mother, may maintain an action for the injury or death of a child, and a guardian for the injury or death of his ward." As the right to recover damages for the death of a human being is purely statutory, the statute must be strictly construed; and, before appellant can recover, he must bring himself clearly within its terms. When the statute specifies who may bring such action, only those persons named can maintain it. If no such person exists, then no recovery can be had. Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co. 141 Ind. 443, and cases cited. At common law a bastard has no father, and was considered the son of nobody. He was sometimes called filius nullius, and sometimes filius populi. 1 Bl. Com. 458, 459; 2 Kent, Com. 212; Simmons v. Bull, 21 Ala. 501, 56 Am. Dec. 257, and note 258; Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 15 Am. Rep. 339; Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 120 Mo. 275. It is said in Bl. Com. 459: "A bastard cannot be heir to anyone, neither can he have heirs, but of his own body; for, being nullius filius, he is therefore of kin to nobody, and has no ancestor from whom any inheritable blood can be derived." It is a rule of construction that prima facie the word "child" or "children," when used either in a statute or will, means legitimate child or children; that is, that bastards are not within the meaning of the term "child" or "children." Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co., and Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. supra, and 46 Fed. Rep. 269, 273; Dickinson v. Northeastern R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & C. 735; Harkins v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 15 Phila. 286; Gibson v. Midland R. Co. 2 Ont. R. 6 H. L. 265; Barnes v. Greenezebach, 1 Edw. Ch. 41; Wait, Act. & Def. 49; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 229, and notes on pages 230–233; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 770; 1 Beven, Neg. 250; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, p. 492, § 409; Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, § 85; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 13. Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. supra, was an action brought under Stat. 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93, known as "Lord Campbell's Act," passed in 1846. That act provides "that every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and children of the person whose death shall have been caused." Pollock, C. B., said: "But beyond all doubt in the construction of this act of Parliament the word 'child' means legitimate child only." This case is cited and approved in Gibson v. Midland R. Co. supra. Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. supra, was an action brought to recover damages for the death of another, under § 4425, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889. That part of the statute providing who should sue and recover when the deceased was a minor was as follows: "Third, if such deceased be a minor and unmarried, whether such deceased unmarried minor be a natural born or adopted child, . . . then by the father and mother, who may join in the suit, and each shall have an equal interest in the judgment; or if either of them be dead, then by the survivor." The court held that the father of an illegitimate child did not come within the meaning of the act, and could not maintain such action. In Harkins v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. supra, it was held, under the statute of Pennsylvania which enacts that the persons entitled to recover damages for any injury causing death "shall be the husband, widow, children or parents of the deceased and no other relative," did not give any one the right to recover damages for the death of an illegitimate child. The court said that "the words, 'husband, widow, children, parents of the deceased, and no other relative,' had in view the family relation as constituted and recognized by law, and that it was not intended to extend the benefits of the act to persons not falling within the legal definition of the enumerated relationships." We think it clear, both upon principle and the authorities cited, that the father of an illegitimate child cannot recover damages for the death of such child, under the provisions of § 266, Rev. Stat. 1881. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 267. The court did not err, therefore, in overruling appellant's demurrer to the answer, or in sustaining appellee's demurrer to the reply.

Judgment affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

James F. FAILEY, Receiver of The Order of Iron Hall, Appt.,
v.
William H. FEE et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. The validity of a policy or certificate constituting a contract between a benefit society and a member thereof is not destroyed by the adoption of some impracticable scheme for the execution of the contract.
2. Holders of matured certificates of a benefit society become creditors thereof and remain so notwithstanding the subsequent insolvency of the order.
3. A provision in a certificate of membership in a benefit society as to the time of payment will control a different provision in a by-law, where the charter provides for payment as provided either by the by-laws or certificate.
4. Debts established in a proceeding for the receivership of an insolvent foreign corporation will be paid out of the assets in the receiver's hands before sending the remainder of the assets to a receiver at the domicil of the corporation.

APPEAL by intervener from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City refusing to turn over to him funds of the Order of Iron Hall which were in possession of local receivers. Affirmed.

Joseph F. Lloyd and others instituted a proceeding in the courts of Maryland to wind up the affairs of the Order of Iron Hall and Charles J. Wiener and Joseph C. France were appointed receivers. They collected funds which they deposited in a bank, and which were subsequently attached by holders of matured certificates in that order. James F Failey who had been appointed receiver of the order in the state of its domicil made application to have the attachment set aside and the funds turned over to him for distribution. The court decreed that the attachment claims were preferred and that they must be paid before he was entitled to any of the funds. From that decree he appealed.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Cowen & Cross and H. R. Preston, for appellant:

The time given for the payment had not expired in any of the cases and the claims were not due, and attachments would not lie.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Order of the Iron Hall is a beneficial association, and was incorporated under the laws of the state of Indiana. A bill was filed in the superior court of Marion county, of that state, by Albert R. Baker and others against said corporation for the appointment of receivers, and for its dissolution and winding up. On the 23d of August, 1892, the appellant, James F. Failey, was appointed receiver of the said corporation, with power to receive all its property of every kind within and without the state of Indiana, and on the same day Charles J. Wiener and Joseph C. France were duly appointed receivers by the circuit court of Baltimore city, with power to take charge and possession of the property of said corporation in this state. It appears that four of the general officers of the order are citizens of Maryland, residing in the city of Baltimore, and that there are twenty six of its branch associations established in that city. No objection has been made to the exercise of its jurisdiction by the Maryland court in the appointment of receivers. Some months subsequent to their appointment, the appellant filed his petition in the circuit court of Baltimore city, in which he fully set forth the decree of the Indiana court by which he was appointed, and prays that the Maryland receivers may be required to account for and hand over to him all the property and funds of said corporation in their possession and under their control. The Maryland receivers answered this petition on the 10th of April, 1894, and in their answer, among other things, they admit that they have in their hands a large sum of money, which they allege was paid to them solely by the branches of said order and the members thereof in this state, and that they are entitled to have the same distributed among such members as reside here, and that the same should not be sent out of this state for distribution, to their prejudice. They also set up in their answer the claims of certain attaching creditors who issued their attachments before the appointment of receivers in either state, and who claim that, as holders of matured certificates, they cease to be members of said order, and have become creditors thereof. Subsequently the circuit court of Baltimore city ordered its receivers to transmit the funds in their hands to the appellant, in Indiana, retaining here, however, sufficient to meet the claims of the attaching creditors whose claims had not then been, but were reserved for future adjudication. On the 9th of December, 1895, the circuit court of Baltimore city ordered that the claims of the attaching creditors should be paid in full. From this order James F. Failey, the Indiana receiver, has appealed.

It thus appears that the only question presented is as to the correctness of the allowance of the attachment claims, and this depends mainly upon the further question whether these claimants are to be considered as members of the order, or, being holders of matured certificates, they are to be considered creditors. If they are members, they must, as was decided by the court below, go to Indiana, and seek payment from the receivers appointed there. From this decision no appeal has been taken, and all of the funds which were in the hands of the Maryland receivers have been transmitted to Indiana, except the sum involved in this particular controversy, which, as we have seen, was ordered to be returned here to pay creditors, and not members in this state. The appellant bases his claim to the fund in question upon the following grounds: First, that the attachments were premature, the benefits claimed under the matured certificates not being payable at the time the attachments were issued; second, that the holder of a matured certificate does not become such a creditor upon the maturity of his certificate as to enable him to attach the funds of the association when insolvent, nor such a creditor as is contemplated by the rule that requires domestic creditors to be paid before sending the fund out of this jurisdiction; and, lastly, that the contract with the order relied on by the holders of matured certificates is not capable of performance, and will not, therefore, be recognized nor enforced in a court of equity.

We will first consider the nature of the contract which is found in the policy or certificate issued by the order to each of its members, and one of which is held by and is the basis of the claims of each of the appellees. Without setting forth the certificate in full, it is sufficient for the present purpose to say in general terms that it provides that the holder shall be a member of the order, entitled to all the rights and privileges properly belonging to his rank and standing, including a benefit of not exceeding $1,000, provided he shall obey all lawful commands of the order, pay all lawful assessments, and comply with all the laws and usages of the order, and all laws which may hereafter be enacted, and especially with the conditions set forth in the certificate, which, so far as we need now refer to them, are contained in paragraph first, which is as follows: "In case the said member shall continue to pay all assessments and demands which may be legally made against him on this certificate for the full term of seven years from its date, . . . then the said member shall be entitled to a sum not exceeding the principal amount named herein, less the amount he has already received as benefits from the order on account of sickness or other disability or otherwise." We do not think that there is any element of impossibility apparent upon the face of or inherent in the contract as set forth in the certificate. The fact that the business of the order ended disastrously, appears, as far as we can judge from the meager information upon this subject given in the record, to have resulted from a combination of circumstances; and it is probable that the impracticability of the plan or scheme of the order set forth in the by laws had much to do in producing this unfortunate result. The officers in this state representing the order say in their answer to the bill that they have confidence in the organization and plans of the order, and believe that the present difficulties are the result simply of local mismanagement; and the appellant, in a statement under oath, shows that the order was not without valuable assets. It is as follows: Cash on hand, $715,577.33; notes and other securities, $33,148.68; real estate, $25,325; money deposited in bank, $713,333.70; reserve fund in various states and Canada, $1,238,643.18, making a total of nearly $3,000,000. He says, however, that he believes he would not be able to realize more than $200,000 from the large amount deposited in bank, because of the insolvency, and that it would depend very much upon the decisions of the courts of the various states growing out of suits which followed the appointment of receivers in Indiana, as to the amount he would be able eventually to recover from the reserve fund. It would seem, therefore, that the statements made in the bill that the effect of the allegation in the answer in the Indiana suit that the local mismanagement had destroyed the order were not altogether without foundation. But the record does not contain sufficient information as to the actual work done by this order to enable us to say with certainty what was the cause of its downfall. It is true, we have the result; but we are not disposed, as the case is now presented, to say that the impossibility of performing the contract set forth in the certificate is the sole cause of that result. The Case of Bordley (Re Order of Tonti's Estate, 173 Pa. 464), lately decided in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and not yet officially reported, adopts the report of the auditor made in the court from which that case was appealed, and supports the view so strongly urged by the appellant in regard to the nature of the contract. But it seems to us that there is a broad distinction between the contract itself and the mode which the parties may adopt to execute it. The contract may be perfectly valid and capable of execution, while the scheme adopted to execute it may be impracticable; but it does not necessarily follow that the fatal defects of the latter attach to and totally destroy the contractual rights secured by the former. The contract here is not, as suggested by the appellant, to pay $1,000 at the end of seven years upon the payment in the meantime by the member of certain assessments which could not, upon any calculation, produce $500, but it was to pay a sum not exceeding $1,000 within seven years upon the payment during that time of all lawful assessments, and the performance of the other conditions set forth in the certificate. Of course, if the contract in question were the one suggested, the order could not perform it, and live for any extended period, for it is apparent it could not long continue to pay out $1,000 for every $500 received. Such a condition of things, as we have already intimated, does not necessarily result from the contract, however much it may be the result of the plan adopted for assessments or other mismanagement complained of by some of the officers. Under such circumstances, especially where, as here, entire good faith is conceded to the appellees, it would seem to be much more reasonable to leave the parties subject to their contract so far as it applies to the changed conditions, than to entirely ignore it. If, then, we are correct in supposing that the contract is still in existence, what are the rights of the appellees, the holders of matured certificates of membership of the said order? This brings us to the consideration of the second reason upon which the appellant rests his claim, namely, that the appellees, as such holders of matured certificates, do not become such creditors upon the maturity thereof as to attach the funds of the order when insolvent, or to give them any standing to demand that they be paid before sending the fund to Indiana. But the weight of authority is against this view. In 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 478, it is said: "In mutual companies, however, claims founded on policies matured before the receivership, are to be perferred to claims on policies not matured, for the maturity of the policy changes the status of the policy holder. He stands to the company in the same place that a creditor stands to the firm; he is to be preferred to members of the firm." The same principle is announced in the case of Vannata v. New Jersey Mut. L. Ins. Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 19. In the case just cited it was urged that the holders of unmatured certificates and the holders of unpaid matured certificates should stand upon the same plane, but this contention was thus disposed of: "The difference," said the chancellor, "between the cases is that, in the one, the claim was, when the decree was made, the claim of a creditor, and, in the other, there was no claim but that of a member, which was upon the assets, after payment of creditors." And to the same effect are Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116, 119 Mass. 45; Mayer v. Atty. Gen. 32 N. J. Eq. 815; Stamm v. Northwestern Mut. Ben. Asso. (Mich.) 8 West. Rep. 767. But in the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baltimore & O. Employés Relief Asso. 77 Md. 566, this court expressed a similar view. We there held that a claim which had matured by death before dissolution of the association was a preferred claim. And in regard to claims based upon disability caused by sickness or accident, which, under the Constitution and by-laws of that association, entitled a member to the payment of a sum of money as benefits, we said in the same case, we do not see upon what principle the right of a member to claim for a disability that occurred before the dissolution of the association can be held to terminate with its dissolution. Some question has been made as to the effect of the insolvency of the order on the claims of the appellees, but it does not appear to us that the validity or status of the claims can be affected by an insolvency which did not exist until after the maturity of the certificates. Being creditors, the insolvency of the order would have no more effect upon their claims than upon those of any other creditors. When the certificates matured, the holders thereupon became creditors, and they remain so notwithstanding the subsequent insolvency of the order. But, again, it was urged that the attachments cannot stand because they were issued on claims of uncertain amounts, the certificates held by the attaching creditors not providing for the payment of any definite sum of money, but for a sum not greater than $1,000. It appears, however, by the agreed statement of facts found in the record that at the time when the receivers were appointed there was an amount of money in the hands of the order sufficient to pay all the matured certificates at the times when the same were due and payable according to their tenor; that the receiver also had an amount sufficient to pay the same, and that by the law of the order the maximum amount named in the certificate would have been payable, and it would have been paid if the receivers had not been appointed, and the business brought to an end. Hence the amount which each attached creditor was entitled to had become certain and fixed before the attachments issued.

Finally, it was urged that the attachments were prematurely issued, because the benefits were not payable at the time those proceedings were instituted. This view is based upon the theory that the time for payment specified in the certificate is controlled by the provisions of a by-law regulating the time of payment, which it is conceded was adopted subsequent to the issuing of the certificates. The latter provides that, upon certain conditions, which have been complied with, benefits shall be paid at the end of seven years, while the by-law provides that such benefits shall, when found correct, be adjusted within ninety days from the expiration of the certificate. While it is true, the certificate is accepted subject to all laws which might, after its date, be enacted by the order, yet, inasmuch as by the third section of the charter it is provided that benefits shall be paid as may be provided either by the by-laws or in the certificate of membership, the provision as to time of payment when found in the latter should govern. In the recent case of Cohen v. Supreme Sitting of O. I. H. (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 93. In construing a similar certificate, it was said: "The reference to the laws of the association in the present case cannot be said to relate to the time of payment, but rather to the affirmative obligations assumed by the holder of the certificate. Especially is this so in view of the fact that the articles of association expressly provide that the amount shall be paid at such times as may be provided by the laws governing such payment or in the certificate of membership. The fundamental law, therefore, recognized the time of payment as fixed by the certificate, and the by-law subsequently passed applied only to such certificates as by their terms made the sum payable at the time fixed by the by-law."

In addition to this, being creditors, the appellees are entitled to payment whether their attachments are valid or not, and under our ruling in the case of Day v. Postal Teleg. Co. 66 Md. 354, it is clear the fund should be distributed by the Maryland receivers to the payment of debts established in this proceeding, and the balance, if any, should be paid over to the Indiana receiver. It follows that the order appealed from must be affirmed.

Order affirmed, with costs.

Samuel NIXON et al., Respts.,
v.
James G. REID et al., Appts.

1. The power to grant ferry leases or licenses belongs to the police power of the state, and may be exercised upon navigable rivers, subject to the power of Congress to supersede the subordinate control.

2. A ferry lease granted under a statute which allows to all who choose the privilege of bidding therefor is not within the prohibition of the organic act of Dakota territory as to "granting private charters or especial privileges;" or the constitutional provision against "private or special laws" authorizing ferries.

3. The right to establish a ferry at a certain place on a river within the jurisdiction of county commissioners may be granted by them so far as their jurisdiction goes, although the opposite side of the river is within an Indian reservation.

4. A ferry lease for five years with a privilege of five or ten more years at the option of the licensee is not in excess of the power to grant a lease for a term not exceeding fifteen years.

5. An assignment of a ferry lease is not invalid, at least when it is made with consent of the state by its agents.

6. A ferry license is exclusive of the right to operate any other ferry within the limits prescribed where the law provides that no other license shall be granted within 2 miles on either side.

(April 18, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Potter County in favor of plaintiffs in an action to enjoin the defendants from operating the ferry across the Missouri river at Forest City. Affirmed.

13 Wall. 441, 20 L. ed. 660; Territory, McMahon, v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 405, 3 L. R. A. 355.

The authority to establish ferries lies "within the scope of that immense mass of undelegated powers which are reserved to the states respectively."

Conway v. Taylor, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 603, 17 L. ed. 191; Swan v. Williams, 2 Mich. 427; Clinton v. Englebrecht, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 434, 20 L. ed. 659.

The legislatures of the territories, Dakota included, have, and always have had, the right and the power, the same as state legislatures, to establish public ferries.

The "or" in § 1889, U. S. Rev. Stat. reading: "The legislative assemblies of the several territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges," is used as interpretative or explanatory of preceding words.

Arthur v. Cumming, 91 U. S. 362, 23 L. ed. 438; Brown v. Com. 8 Mass. 59; State v. Gilbert, 13 Vt. 647; Com. v. Grey, 2 Gray, 502, 61 Am. Dec. 476; Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327.

This section is purely and simply a prohibition against the creation of, or a granting of, "especial privileges" to corporations by private statute.

Elk Point v. Vaughn, 1 Dak. 108; Alger v. Hill, 2 Wash. 344; Seattle v. Yesler, 1 Wash. Terr. 572.

Congress never intended or understood § 1889 as restricting the territorial legislatures from establishing public ferries.

Wells v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 531; Wells, F. & Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 469.

If the legislature is prohibited only from passing "local or special laws," on any given subject, it is allowable to that legislature to pass general laws on the same subject.

Co.* v. Orton, 6 Sawy. 157; Frye v. Partridge, 82 Ill. 267; Elk Point v. Vaughn, supra; Proprietors of Charles River Bridge v. Proprietors of Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. ed. 773; Evans v. Hughes County, 6 Dak. 102.

If the court now decides the law unconstitutional, respondents nevertheless must prevail in this action.

At the October, 1888, term of the territorial supreme court, that court in Evans v. Hughes County, supra, decided the ferry law as not in conflict with § 1889, U. S. Rev. Stat. In April, 1889, and after that decision had been rendered and while that decision still stood undisturbed, as the judicial interpretation of this law, by the highest court of the territory, the county commissioners of Potter county, and Bullard, the grantor of respondents, relying upon the letter and upon the judicial determination of the constitutionality of this law, entered into the contract or lease, for the ferry.

The rights of respondents, acquired at the time they were, cannot be disturbed by the decision of this court.

Co.* v. Orton, 6 Sawy. 157.

A public ferry is a public highway of special description.

Sullivan v. Lafayette County Supers. 58 Miss. 790; Com. v. Bacon, 13 Bush, 210.

The laying out of roads, highways, and the erection of bridges, and the establishment of ferries rest entirely and exclusively within the realms of the royal prerogative.

An estate in such a franchise and an estate in land rest upon the same principle.

3 Kent, Com. 459.

A ferry is in respect of the landing place and not of the water. The water may be to one, and the ferry to another.

13 Vin. Abr. 208.

A ferry franchise, being a portion of the prerogative of the sovereign, reposed in the subject, is not at all dependent on the ownership of the land at the river's edge; riparian rights and ownership are not elements of the franchise, nor are they sufficient, or any, foundation for the ferry rights.

Columbia Delaware Bridge Co. v. Geisse, 38 N. J. L. 39; Sullivan v. Lafayette County Supers. supra; Trustees of Schools v. Tatman, 13 Ill. 27; Walker v. Armstrong, 1 Kan. 198.

Ferry franchises are granted by the state.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Fanning v. Gregoire, 57 U. S. 16 How. 524, 14 L. ed. 1043; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710; Mills v. St. Clair County, 7 Ill. 197.

The privilege of the license may not be as valuable to the grantee, by not extending across the river, but as far as it does extend, he is entitled to all the provisions of the law, the object of which was to secure the exclusive privilege of maintaining a ferry at a designated place.

The condition of the country on the other side of the river is not a material fact in this case at all.

United States v. Cook, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 591, 22 L. ed. 210; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 736.

The propr etary right of the United States can in no respect restrict or modify the exercise of this sovereign power by a state.
